The BYU Journal of Law and Education (Journal) is published jointly by the J. Reuben Clark Law School and the Brigham Young University Department of Educational Leadership. Over the past six years, the law school and the educational leadership department published Perspectives. The Journal represents the evolution of Perspectives from an informational pamphlet composition to the more comprehensive format seen in the present issue.

The purpose of the Journal is to provide a forum for scholarly works concerning law and education. While the fundamental focus is on K-12 education, there is also a recognition that educational law is not developed in a vacuum. Therefore, the Journal publishes articles which focus on higher education to establish perspective on the education field in general. For example, the Broadhead article in this issue deals with university level student-athletes. Considerable focus is centered on a university’s duty to educate these students. However, implicit in this discussion is the assumption that K-12 education plays a central role in determining whether or not the athlete is prepared for the university educational environment.

The Journal is designed as a practical help to those directly involved in the educational process. This issue’s lead article by Dr. Thomas is an excellent example. While retaining a high degree of professionalism, the article provides a step-by-step analysis describing, in plain language, when it is permissible and when it is not permissible for an educator to photocopy copyrighted materials.

Since announcing the change in format from Perspectives to the present Journal format we have received a very positive response. We encourage all readers to submit articles to the Journal for possible publication. To submit articles, subscribe to future issues, or comment on the new format, contact:
