ACKNOWLEDGMENT

The Law Review would like to acknowledge the contribution of those on the 1992-93 Board of the International and Comparative Law Annual who contributed in innumerable ways to this issue. The leaders of the 1992-93 Board were Alexander Dushku and Jonathan Johnson. Associates on the Board included Diane Durfey Card, Daniel A. Thomson, Lisa Norton, Andrea Nuffer, Ryan J. Earl, Galen LeGrand Fletcher, and Glenn Rowley. We would also like to thank Lisa Norton, Editor-in-Chief of the B.Y.U. Journal of Public Law, and the B.Y.U. French Department for their editorial assistance on the French articles in this issue.

FOREWORD

The papers in this Symposium issue were first presented at a conference on "Individualism and Communitarianism in Contemporary Legal Systems" held in conjunction with a joint meeting of the American Society of Comparative Law and the International Association of Legal Science at the J. Reuben Clark Law School, Brigham Young University on September 10-12, 1992. As Professor Glendon's paper indicates, the preparation and thought that went into the organization of this Symposium spanned a number of years. Where traditional comparative law conferences often focus on specific areas of legal doctrine, the aim of this Symposium was to invoke comparative analysis to explore the impact of law on a series of institutions and settings that play a vital role in the social environment: the family, local community control, religious organizations and religious liberty, the world of work, and educational institutions. The result was a Symposium that allowed comparative insight that ranged not only across cultures, but also across doctrinal domains. The papers published here make a major contribution to legal reflection on the relationship between law and intermediary institutions situated between the individual and the state.

For the success of the Symposium, special thanks must be given to the American Society of Comparative Law and the International Association of Legal Science for selecting Brigham Young University as the venue of their 1992 meetings and for providing financial support that contributed to the quality of the Symposium and enabled many of the participants to attend. The officers of the IALS in particular played a vital role in honing and focusing a broad but vital arena for comparative research. Professors Mary Ann Glendon and Peter Sarcevic deserve special credit in this regard. At the local level, support from the David M. Kennedy Center for International Studies and the J. Reuben Clark Law School is also gratefully acknowledged. Finally, enough cannot be said for the contributions made by law school staff and students, and in particular for the countless hours expended by the members of the B.Y.U. Law Review in editing the papers and preparing them for publication.
