Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

Ira C. Lupu

Robert W. Tuttle

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.law.byu.edu/lawreview

Part of the First Amendment Commons, Religion Law Commons, and the Sexuality and the Law Commons

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://digitalcommons.law.byu.edu/lawreview/vol2004/iss5/4

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Brigham Young University Law Review at BYU Law Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in BYU Law Review by an authorized editor of BYU Law Digital Commons. For more information, please contact hunterlawlibrary@byu.edu.
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

Ira C. Lupu & Robert W. Tuttle*

I. Introduction .................................................................. 1790
II. The Decline of Ecclesiastical Immunity ...................... 1797
III. The Remnants of Ecclesiastical Immunity ................... 1805
IV. Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity ............ 1819
   A. The Wrongdoer’s Criminal and Civil Liability for Sexual Misconduct ........................................ 1820
   B. Civil Claims Against Religious Organizations and Supervisors .................................................. 1832
      1. Institutional fiduciary duties to victims of sexual misconduct ...................................................... 1834
      2. Institutional duties of care in employment of clergy .................................................................... 1845
         a. Negligent ordination ........................................... 1846
         b. Negligent employment ....................................... 1847
            (1) Categorical approaches ................................. 1850
               (a) No immunity ........................................... 1850
               (b) Categorical immunity ............................... 1856
            (2) An alternative approach .............................. 1858
               (a) Reconciling tort law and the First Amendment: lessons from the freedom of the press ... 1859
                  (i) Substantive standards of liability ... 1860
                      a. Knowledge ......................................... 1860

* Ira C. Lupu is the F. Elwood & Eleanor Davis Professor of Law, George Washington University; Robert W. Tuttle is Professor of Law, George Washington University. Our thanks to Phil Harris for comments on drafts of this piece; to Mark Chopko, Bill Marshall, and Cheryl Preston for their spoken and written commentary made as part of this conference; to Jesse Merriam for excellent research assistance; and to Michael Young (formerly Dean of George Washington University Law School and now President of the University of Utah) for generous research support. In the interests of full disclosure, we note that Professor Tuttle has served as a legal advisor to the Washington, D.C., Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA). The positions taken in this paper are ours and are not necessarily shared by the ELCA or any of the recipients of our gratitude. The mistakes, of course, are entirely ours.
b. The relationship between culpable knowledge and authority over the offending employee .......................... 1867

c. Constitutionally permissible adjudication of claims against religious institutions .................. 1869

(ii) Processes of adjudication and the First Amendment......................................................... 1871

(b) Neutral principles and evidentiary sources ................................................................. 1873

(3) Vicarious liability of a religious organization for its agent’s sexual misconduct .................. 1879

C. Criminal Culpability of Supervisors and Religious Institutions ................................................. 1884

1. Manchester, New Hampshire .................................................. 1886

2. Boston, Massachusetts .......................................................... 1887

3. Suffolk County (Long Island), New York ................................................. 1888

4. Phoenix, Arizona ............................................................ 1889

5. Overarching considerations ............................................. 1890

V. Conclusion ....................................................................................... 1896

I. INTRODUCTION

Leaders frequently disappoint their followers. Religious leaders, who purport to speak in the name of God and who address our deepest longings and fears, are unusually vulnerable to this phenomenon. Humans, deeply aware of their own fallibility, will often project unreasonable expectations of perfection upon those who hold authority in communities of faith. The resulting tendency to disappoint is amplified in our own time and place, in which the ubiquitous mass media endlessly parade the flaws, foibles, and faux pas of the prominent.

Even if the world were more generous and forgiving towards those in leadership, however, recent events and disclosures would still have produced a massive decline in the status of clergy and those who supervise them. Episodes of sexual exploitation and other breaches of trust by members of the clergy are epidemic. The scale of betrayal represented by these stories is more massive than most people can absorb. The tales are deeply aggravated by the follow-up accounts of religious supervisors who, having learned of such malfeasance, failed to take the proper steps to prevent recurrence. The combination of misbehaving clergy and irresponsible supervision has widely expanded the scope of harms committed, the sheer number of victims, and the public outrage that has ensued.

Much, but by no means all, of this story has involved the sexual exploitation of children, which of course has accentuated the public’s anger and sense of betrayal. The nationwide scandal involving the Roman Catholic Church, the wrongful behavior of some of its priests, and the repeat offenses facilitated by the conduct of those in its hierarchy of supervision have been deeply impressed upon the public consciousness. It will take several generations, a clean record, and an abundance of good deeds for the Church of Rome in the U.S. to regain the full measure of its institutional reputation.

2. The story of supervisory failure is told in the most detail in the reports of the prosecutors who have considered indicting such supervisors. See, e.g., THOMAS F. REILLY, THE SEXUAL ABUSE OF CHILDREN IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC ARCHDIOCESE OF BOSTON: A REPORT BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (2003) [hereinafter MASSACHUSETTS AG REPORT]. Additional reports from New Hampshire and Suffolk County, NY, are cited in note 11 and Part III.C.

The legal fallout from the scandal of the Catholic Church may be even more widespread and enduring than the religious consequences. Priests have gone to prison for lengthy terms. Many courts have upheld tort claims against dioceses and their officers, and First Amendment defenses once thought likely to insulate defendants against such claims have been aggressively advanced and explicitly rejected. Churches have had to sell substantial properties to pay out many millions of dollars in legal settlements. Several Catholic dioceses have filed for reorganization in bankruptcy to protect their assets against potential judgment creditors, whose

4. For predictions and concerns about that fallout, see Mark E. Chopko, Shaping the Church: Overcoming the Twin Challenges of Secularization and Scandal (Jan. 15, 2003) (unpublished manuscript, on file with the authors) (article based on the Brendan Brown Lecture at the Columbus School of Law, Catholic University of America). Mr. Chopko is General Counsel for the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops. Id. at 125.

5. For details of such incarcerations, see Catholics for a Free Choice, supra note 1. John Geoghan, one of the more notorious of the abusers in the Archdiocese of Boston, was recently murdered in prison while serving a nine- to ten-year sentence for sexually assaulting minors. Richard Nangle & Kathleen A. Shaw, Geoghan is Killed in Prison, SHIRLEY (MA) TELEGRAM & GAZETTE, Aug. 24, 2003, at A1, available at http://poynter.org/column.asp?id=46&aid=45500. Until recently, Catholic bishops had escaped indictment in these scandals. See Alan Cooperman, Bishops Have Eluded Sex Abuse Indictments; Experts Cite Hurdles for Prosecuting Those Who Did Not Sop Others’ Crimes, WASH. POST, June 4, 2003, at A2. In September, 2004, however, a Massachusetts district attorney announced the indictment of former Bishop Thomas Dupre of Springfield on charges of child sexual assault. The district attorney also announced that he could not pursue the indictment because the statute of limitations had run. See Adam Garlick, Former Springfield Bishop Avoids Prosecution on Sex Charges, PORTSMOUTH HERALD, Sept. 28, 2004, available at http://www.seacoastonline.com/news/09282004/south_of/40083.htm.

6. See infra Part III.

7. Id.

claims will arise from incidents of sexual misconduct. In several jurisdictions, prosecutors have impaneled grand juries to investigate the possibility of criminal wrongdoing by church leaders. Although prosecutors have yet to bring charges for criminally neglectful or otherwise culpable supervision, they have filed public reports that suggest criminal behavior of this sort has occurred, and settlements between prosecutors and religious entities have included terms that deeply involve the state in the process of clergy supervision.

The problems of sexual exploitation and supervisory failure, however, are not limited to the Roman Catholic Church, nor are the problems limited to sexual assaults on minors. Relationships between clergy-counselors and adult parishioners have spawned a large number of legally actionable sexual abuse claims involving a wide variety of religious denominations. Plaintiffs in these cases have asserted a range of theories of tort liability, including professional malpractice and breach of fiduciary duty on the part of the clergy-counselor. The same claims have been pressed up the chain of supervisory responsibility within religious denominations, and plaintiffs have asserted that supervisors in these circumstances have committed tortious acts of negligent training, supervision, retention, and assignment of clergy, as well as breaches of fiduciary duty.

The cases in which an adult is the victim have received less public attention than those involving children, and they typically do not raise the specter of criminal law violations. Nevertheless, these cases do raise problems concerning the collision between tort law and the First Amendment immunities of clergy, denominational supervisors, and religious entities themselves. Indeed, because the cases brought by adult victims rarely involve violations of criminal law, they present the most difficult constitutional questions. Because the public interest in clergy behavior is weaker in cases involving consenting adults than in cases involving children, state intervention in the affairs of religious organizations is harder to justify in the adult cases. Here too, however, the past several decades have witnessed a quite remarkable trend away from recognition of First Amendment defenses and a judicial willingness to impose liability upon clergy—and their supervisors—at least as broad as the liability imposed upon analogous secular enterprises.

www.affirmation.org/news/1996_05.asp (describing series of abuse cases and the failure of the Church of Jesus Christ’s authorities to take proper action against the perpetrators).

14. We discuss such cases in Part IV.A.

15. In Part IV.B.1 we discuss cases in which victims of clergy misconduct assert that supervisors have breached fiduciary duties owed to such victims.

16. See discussion and cases cited infra Part III. In one additional (and less well-publicized) context, sexual misbehavior by members of the clergy has resulted in the erosion of an important and well-recognized legal immunity of religious institutions. For many years, the courts have recognized a “ministerial exception” to the law of employment discrimination and other features of the law governing the employment relation between church and clergy. See, e.g., Starkman v. Evans, 198 F.3d 173 (5th Cir. 1999); McClure v. Salvation Army, 460 F.2d 553 (5th Cir. 1972). As we discuss in Part II, infra, such claims have been barred whenever adjudication of them would involve courts in superintending the evaluation of clergy performance by a faith community. Recently, however, several courts have recognized sexual
This paper will critically analyze the possibility and structure of First Amendment defenses to actions, both civil and criminal, arising out of sexual misconduct by members of the clergy. When faced with First Amendment defenses, most courts have, unfortunately, reacted in constitutionally unsophisticated ways. These courts have tended to either totally accept or completely reject claims of First Amendment immunity, and they frequently fail to ground either stance in a well-reasoned account of the distinctive constitutional place of religious institutions. We think that such an account is available, and that it sheds considerable light on the problems addressed in this paper. As we explain below, the Establishment Clause imposes jurisdictional limits on courts’ authority to adjudicate issues of religious import, and the Free Exercise Clause imposes limits on laws or doctrines that single out religion for disfavored treatment.\footnote{See infra Parts II & III.}

This paper unpacks the significance of that pair of principles in a variety of contexts. The most important and complex situation we explore is the liability of a religious entity for misconduct by clergy over whom the entity has some authority. Because religious institutions are often the only party in a position to offer compensation, courts and juries experience great pressure to allow for institutional liability. That pressure is understandable, but an optimal legal arrangement should balance the concerns of the tort system that liability be fairly and efficiently placed, on the one hand, with the constitutional concerns regarding structural autonomy of religious institutions, on the other. We believe this balancing is best accomplished by limiting liability for supervisory wrongs to situations in which supervisors, with requisite authority to act, have actual knowledge of clergy propensity for wrongdoing, or in which such supervisors act in reckless disregard of the risks of such wrongdoing. A similar standard already reconciles tort considerations and First Amendment concerns in the law of libel, and we argue that a similar structure of reconciliation can operate successfully here.

\footnote{See Bollard v. Cal. Province of the Soc’y of Jesus, 196 F.3d 940 (9th Cir. 1999); Black v. Snyder, 471 N.W.2d 715 (Minn. Ct. App. 1991); McKelvey v. Pierce, 800 A.2d 840 (N.J. 2002). Sexual harassment claims, like tort claims against church leaders for misbehavior of clergy, may represent one more example of the erosion of ecclesiastical immunities under the pressure to make institutions account for sex-related wrongdoing by their agents.}
Setting up this argument requires some preparatory groundwork. Part II will trace the expansion of relevant theories of tort and criminal liability, and the waning of immunities—constitutional and statutory—that once applied to such actions. The legal developments associated with this trend include the general expansion of tort liability beyond primary wrongdoers to secondary actors and the enterprises for which they act; the erosion of charitable immunity once made broadly available by state law; and the changes in law triggered by heightened social awareness of the vulnerability of children, and of adults in counseling relationships, to sexual exploitation. The legal and cultural phenomena that animate these trends occur against the backdrop, which Part II also explores, of a comparable decline in the constitutional distinctiveness of religious institutions. This legally recognized loss of distinctiveness has facilitated the exposure of religious institutions to trends which otherwise might have bypassed these entities.

Part III of the paper suggests a normative theory of the constitutional distinctiveness of religion and ties that theory to an Establishment Clause conception of ecclesiastical immunity.18 Most conceptions of such immunity represent assertions of the liberty of religious organizations and are grounded in the Constitution’s Free Exercise Clause. Our approach, however, is rooted in the Establishment Clause and proceeds from a vision of jurisdictional limits on civil government. As we articulate in Part III and elaborate in Part IV, the jurisdiction of civil government is limited to temporal matters—that is, government is constitutionally disabled from addressing or asserting control over ultimate questions. This basic precept undergirds the immunity of religious institutions in resolving internal disputes and in selecting and training their leaders.

Part IV of the paper then brings the lessons of Part III to bear on the particular problems of sexual abuse by clergy, and the criminal and civil liability of secondary actors for such misconduct. Here we analyze the particulars of tort claims frequently advanced by plaintiffs, and we offer guidelines to courts and criminal prosecutors faced with such claims concerning how best to reconcile the appropriate First Amendment norms with the theories of liability associated with clergy misconduct.

Woven into the fabric of Part IV are three major themes. First, those who perpetrate sexual harms against children, or others who lack capacity to consent, have no claim of ecclesiastical immunity. Second, the religious status of persons and the religious character of institutions should not give rise to fiduciary duties as a matter of law. In applying the law of fiduciary duty, courts should take great care to avoid the imposition, by juries and others, of liability for breaches of duties that are distinctly religious. For example, some courts have used the image of the shepherd—drawn from the religious self-understanding of pastors and congregations—to justify the imposition of fiduciary duties on such leaders and organizations, even though parallel secular leaders or organizations might not be subject to those same duties.19 The creation of such duties violates the constitutional prohibition on discrimination against religion as compared with analogous secular roles and entities. Third, adjudication of wrongful acts in the hiring and supervision of clergy must be conducted with sensitivity to constitutional concerns of both substance and process. The Establishment Clause forbids the state to use adjudication of tort claims as an instrument to effectively institute a system of licensure for clergy or to determine the structure of religious organizations. Borrowing from the law concerning First Amendment limitations on the tort liability of the press, we argue that liability of supervising institutions should be limited to cases involving an “intentional failure to supervise,” and the judicial processes should be tailored to maintain compliance with that standard.

II. THE DECLINE OF ECCLESIASTICAL IMMUNITY

At the beginning of the twentieth century, a person sexually molested by someone acting on behalf of a religious organization would not have contemplated legal action against the religious organization and would not have been successful in such an action had she tried. By the beginning of the twenty-first century, however, a person who had suffered such an injury might well be a successful plaintiff in a suit against the wrongdoer, the ecclesiastical officials, and the religious entity in which the individual defendants served.

19. See infra notes 113–62 and accompanying text.

How can we account for this dramatic change? As Professor Idleman has discussed, part of the answer rests in changing cultural norms. Members of religious communities have become increasingly willing to pursue legal claims against their religious community and its agents. Moreover, religious institutions, like many institutions, have seen their reputations decline, at least partly because of widely publicized scandals, both sexual and financial.

These cultural shifts have paralleled—and perhaps even fostered—legal changes that have dramatically increased the exposure of religious organizations to liability. First, a general decline in the doctrine of charitable immunity has made possible a wide array of tort claims against religious organizations. Under this doctrine, which held sway in American courts from the late nineteenth through the mid-twentieth centuries, nonprofit organizations were immune from liability for torts that they or their agents committed against beneficiaries of their services. By the early 1960s, charitable immunity was quickly eroding, especially with respect to medical malpractice claims against nonprofit hospitals. In most states, the

---

21. Id. at 241.

22. Id. at 242.

23. Janet Fairchild, Annotation, Tort Immunity of Nongovernmental Charities—Modern Status, 25 A.L.R.4th 517, 522–23 (1983). The doctrine of charitable immunity in American law originated out of court decisions applying two English cases, both of which had been overruled by the time of their adoption into American law. Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 20, 26–28 (1885); McDonald v. Mass. Gen. Hosp., 120 Mass. 432 (1876). The doctrine was eventually adopted by nearly all American jurisdictions, either by judicial decision or statute. Charitable immunity rested on a number of policy grounds, including a notion of implied trust limiting the uses of the organization’s funds to its charitable purposes, and a theory that beneficiaries of such services implicitly waived their right to sue in tort over injuries suffered as a result of receiving the services. WILLIAM W. BASSETT, RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS AND THE LAW §§ 7.2–6 (2003).

24. Most state courts dealt with these claims by creating an exception to charitable immunity for injured beneficiaries who paid a fee for the charity’s services. See, e.g., Robertson v. Executive Comm. of Baptist Convention, 190 S.E. 432 (Ga. 1937); Morton v. Savannah Hosp., 96 S.E. 887, 888 (Ga. 1918) (holding that the only funds subject to tort judgments are those received from paying patients); Bougon v. Volunteers of Am., 151 So. 797 (La. Ct. App. 1934); Lincoln Mem’l Univ. v. Sutton, 43 S.W.2d 195, 196 (Tenn. 1931).
erosion was complete by the mid-1980s. Policy reasons for the shift are not hard to fathom: the culture had come to expect a legal remedy for nearly every injury, and institutions seemed better able than the injured parties to absorb—or to purchase insurance to cover—the costs of such injuries.

Second, the past century also witnessed a significant expansion in theories of tort liability, especially in the law’s willingness to hold supervisors and institutions liable for injuries inflicted by their agents. The earliest of these developments was the concept of vicarious liability, commonly referred to as respondeat superior, under which the employer is liable for the tortious acts of its agent when such acts fall within the scope of employment. Later developments in tort theory have expanded the employer’s nonvicarious liability to include injuries caused by the employer’s negligence in hiring, training, supervising, and retaining agents who inflict injuries on third parties. The employer may be liable even when the alleged wrong, such as

25. By the beginning of 1986, thirty-nine jurisdictions had abrogated the doctrine for certain charities, and twenty of the thirty-nine had abandoned it altogether. See Fairchild, supra note 23, at 547.

26. Note, The Quality of Mercy: “Charitable Torts” and Their Continuing Immunity, 100 HARV. L. REV. 1382, 1399 n.8 (1987) (quoting President of Georgetown College v. Hughes, 130 F.2d 810, 815 (D.C. Cir. 1942) (“The doctrine of immunity of charitable corporations found its way into the law . . . through misconception . . . of previously established principles.”)). Although the doctrine of charitable immunity has certainly waned, special protections for charitable institutions remain in many jurisdictions. Very few states retain blanket immunity for charities. Many place monetary limits on charities’ exposure to tort liability, and even more extend immunity to individual volunteers of charities for torts arising out of their work on behalf of the charity. See, e.g., Conners v. Northeast Hosp. Corp., 789 N.E.2d 129 (Mass. 2003) (applying a Massachusetts law that imposes a $20,000 cap on charities’ liability for tort damages, MASS. GEN. LAWS ch. 231, § 85K (2002)). Other states restrict charities’ exposure to the limits of their liability insurance policy. See, e.g., MD. CODE ANN., CTS. & JUD. PROC. § 5-406 (2004) (limiting liability of charitable organization to $200,000, if charity has that amount of liability insurance); Abramson v. Reiss, 638 A.2d 743 (Md. 1994) (reaffirming Maryland’s doctrine of charitable immunity). New Jersey is notable for its maintenance of a strong doctrine of charitable immunity. The immunity of charitable institutions in New Jersey, however, does not extend to individuals who serve such entities. See, e.g., F.G. v. MacDonell, 696 A.2d 697 (N.J. 1997) (permitting a lawsuit against priests for alleged breach of fiduciary duties owed to parishioner). The fall of charitable immunity, of course, is a religion-neutral phenomenon. Where such protections remain, they are enjoyed by religious and nonreligious charities alike; where abrogated, the same burden is borne by both religious and nonreligious organizations.

sexual abuse, occurs outside the scope of the agent’s employment but nevertheless is facilitated by the employment relationship.28

Third, particularly in the last quarter century, the law has become especially responsive to sexual violence, abuse, and exploitation.29 Such developments include prosecution of marital and date rape;30 shield laws to protect rape victims in the legal process;31 laws requiring the reporting of child abuse, including sexual molestation;32 prohibitions against sexual harassment in schools and workplaces;33 and the imposition of tort liability and professional discipline on lawyers, physicians, and therapists who sexually exploit their clients or patients.34

28. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 317 (1965) (discussing a master’s liability for certain acts of a servant even though the acts fall outside the scope of the servant’s agency). For a discussion of liability for such negligent acts by supervisors employed by religious entities, see infra Part III.

30. See generally SUSAN ESTRICH, REAL RAPE 80–91 (1987) (discussing the reform of rape laws under which the scope of the crime has expanded).

31. FED. R. EVID. 412.

Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

Notwithstanding these general developments in the law of tort and crime, one might expect that the religion clauses of the First Amendment would provide constitutional immunities for ecclesiastical authorities implicated in the wrongdoing of their agents. Indeed, if existing doctrines of church-state separation were generally robust, one would be surprised to see a rapid waning of such immunities. These lawsuits, after all, effectively empower judges and juries to evaluate the processes of assignment and supervision of clergy and may coercively extract significant wealth from religious communities if state-empowered decision-makers determine that the leaders of such communities have violated legal duties of care or loyalty.

The overarching constitutional regime of Separationism that once grounded First Amendment-based immunities for religious entities, however, has been shrinking. A Separationist regime depends entirely on a conception of the constitutional distinctiveness of religion and religious institutions. Thirty years ago, in Separationism’s heyday, the Supreme Court stood firmly behind just such a conception. The Court’s stance was rooted in both religion clauses of the First Amendment. With respect to the Establishment Clause, norms of Separation included the prohibition on officially sponsored religious speech in public schools and a firm bar on direct financial assistance to “pervasively sectarian” institutions, including houses of worship and religious elementary and secondary schools. With respect to the Free Exercise Clause, the Court’s decisions suggested that state-imposed burdens on religious freedom are subject to strict and searching judicial examination, even if the burdens arise from laws of general applicability. And another line of

35. By “Separationism,” we mean a constitutional regime that includes distinctive rights and disabilities for religious institutions. We analyze and compare Separationism with other constitutional regimes in Ira C. Lupu & Robert W. Tuttle, The Distinctive Place of Religious Entities in Our Constitutional Order, 47 VILL. L. REV. 37, 51–65 (2002) [hereinafter Distinctive Place].

36. Sch. Dist. of Abington Township v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963) (holding officially sponsored Bible reading at the start of a public school day violates the Establishment Clause); Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962) (holding that the practice of starting each public school day with the Regent’s Prayer violates the Establishment Clause).

38. See, e.g., Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972) (finding that the Free Exercise Clause supports an exemption from an affirmative duty of parents to send their children to an accredited school until the children reach the age of sixteen).
decisions precluded civil courts from adjudicating disputes, concerning both property and personnel, arising from within a particular faith community.39

By the turn of the millennium, several of the building blocks in the edifice of Separationism had crumbled, and a competing paradigm of Neutrality or evenhandedness between religion and secularity had taken center stage. These developments became manifest in a number of discrete moves in the Supreme Court. First and foremost for our purposes, the Court in Jones v. Wolf40 upheld the authority of lower courts to adjudicate internal church disputes in those situations in which religion-neutral legal principles permit judicial resolution without involvement in matters of theological principle or ecclesiastical structure. Second, in what has become a lengthy series of decisions, the Court has recognized the right of speakers with a religious perspective to have equal access to public fora for speech.41 In these cases, time and again, the Court has rejected defenses based on a Separationist theory of the Establishment Clause. Third, in a development that shocked the world of lawyers and scholars, the decision in Employment Division v. Smith42 narrowed or eliminated the Free Exercise doctrine calling for strict judicial evaluation of burdens imposed on religious freedom by religion-neutral, generally applicable legal norms. Fourth, Establishment Clause constraints on both direct and indirect funding of activities by religious entities have withered.\(^{43}\)

This movement toward Neutrality, though sweeping, has remained incomplete. First, the norms of Separationism have strengthened with respect to the government’s own sponsorship of religious speech,\(^{44}\) especially in the venue of public schools.\(^{45}\) Second, even with respect to direct financial aid to religious institutions, a robust prohibition remains on activities that would render the government responsible for religious indoctrination by private parties.46

Two additional doctrines, both highly significant for the set of problems to which this paper is addressed, also persist. The Court’s teachings about church-state entanglement, which have appeared in both Establishment Clause and Free Exercise settings, have been expressly reaffirmed,47 though they have not been applied in the Supreme Court with much rigor over the past fifteen years.48 Moreover, constitutional limitations persist with respect to adjudication of matters internal to the structure and belief of religious institutions. Courts, as noted above, may apply religion-neutral principles to similarly neutral aspects of a religious entity’s activities, but courts remain forbidden from resolving questions of religious structure or theological principle.49 Prominent in the context of internal disputes is the “ministerial exception” to employment law, which bars adjudication of most claims against religious entities with respect to decisions involving who shall be a spokesperson for a particular faith.50 In all of these contexts—government speech, direct financial assistance to religious entities, areas of potential entanglement, and resolution of internal church disputes—courts continue to apply norms that derive from the view that religion and religious entities are constitutionally distinctive for some purposes.

What is the relevance of this distinct but incomplete movement from Separationism to Neutrality for questions of ecclesiastical immunity from tort liability? If that movement is ineluctably on its way to completion, and Separationism is a lingering but terminal patient, the answer has the character of prediction—religion-distinctive tort immunities have been disappearing, and they will

46. Agostini, 521 U.S. 203. We explore this proposition in more detail in Sites of Redemption, supra note 43, at 537, and GOVERNMENT PARTNERSHIPS, supra note 43.
47. Agostini, 521 U.S. at 203.
49. The Supreme Court’s opinion in Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990), expressly preserved this line of authority, even as it was rejecting religion-specific exemptions in other contexts. Id. at 877. Kathleen Brady builds her contribution to this conference on this dictum. Brady, supra note 18, at 1633–34.
50. See discussion infra notes 67–75 and accompanying text.
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

continue to vanish to the point of extinction. At the bottom of the slide, religious entities and their officers will have neither fewer nor greater defenses than those available to comparable secular organizations and their agents.

If, however, the trend away from a constitutional conception of religious distinctiveness has a normative stopping place, then the answer to the question we pose about the future of ecclesiastical immunities may be very different. In a world in which, for a variety of legal and cultural reasons, religion has lost much of its constitutional distinctiveness, the blanket immunities once available to religious entities are gone for good. It remains to be asked, however, whether one might yet mount a normative defense for a narrower, still vibrant version of Separationism, and whether such a defense would lead in turn to a more focused account of immunity for religious institutions and their personnel with respect to certain categories of legal action. It is to such a normative theory, and its implications for issues of legal responsibility for clergy misbehavior, that we now turn.

III. THE REMNANTS OF ECCLESIASTICAL IMMUNITY

As we asserted in Part II, Separationism is built on a concept of the constitutional distinctiveness of religion and religious institutions. For understandable reasons, the constitutional doctrines supporting Separationism, as a matter of Free Exercise, non- Establishment, or both, receded from the high water marks reached in the 1970s. As Professors Bill Marshall, Fred Gedicks, Larry Sager, Chris Eisgruber, and others have argued, contemporary Western culture and values make it impossible to sustain a claim of religion’s overarching distinctiveness and the corresponding claim of religion to specialized legal treatment.

51. We analyze the underpinnings of Separationism as a philosophy of the religion clauses in Distinctive Place, supra note 35, at 51–65.

We have suggested elsewhere, however, that distinctiveness does not have to be an all or nothing proposition. Religion may indeed be distinctive for some constitutional or legal purposes and not others, though we believe that the burden of persuasion should always be placed on the proponent of distinctive treatment.

More fundamentally, the relevant constitutional framework to be applied to questions of constitutional distinctiveness should not begin with an examination of religious belief, practice, or structure. Instead, proper understanding commences with an analysis of political and constitutional theory. Here is our analysis of the question, offered several years ago in the Giannella Lecture at Villanova:

Quite paradoxically, a constitutionally sufficient answer to the question of religious distinctiveness cannot begin with theology or the sociology of religion. It must begin, instead, with a political concept of religion—one implicit in the founders’ “novus ordo seclorum.” Hopes for this new order rested, in important part, on its limited horizon. The order would belong to “the ages,” and its powers would be restricted to the temporal welfare of its citizens. Though each of them might (indeed likely would) have religious commitments, the state itself would have no religious confession to make. By thus circumscribing the government’s jurisdiction, this new world order would avoid both conflict among religious factions for political authority and the inevitable despotism of the religious faction that won out. Seen in political terms, “religion” represents that which the new order disclaims: jurisdiction over ultimate truths, a comprehensive claim to undivided loyalty, and a command to worship. Separationism, then, depends on articulation of this political concept of sacredness and on some attempt to identify what particular aspects of the behavior of religious institutions are bound up with the sacred.

Understood this way, Separationism—a sense of boundary between state and some aspects of institutional behavior—functions much like the constitutional right of privacy, [that is], as a check on totalitarianism. Totalitarian regimes typically try to control intimate aspects of their subjects’ lives. Control of the intellectual, political, sexual, and economic details of the lives of political subjects creates

---

53. Distinctive Place, supra note 35; see also Sites of Redemption, supra note 43, at 543–56.
54. Distinctive Place, supra note 35, at 78–79.
55. Id. at 83–84 (internal citations omitted).
enormous leverage for the state in the struggle for control of their spirits—their souls, if you will. If the right of privacy, at least in part, insulates the realm of the spirit from state control, the constitutional distinctiveness of religious institutions—those that nurture the spirit directly—rests on comparable foundations.

We concluded that lecture with the following conceptualization of the state’s role:

The role of the contemporary state is broad indeed, but it remains circumscribed by its penultimacy. Life’s ultimate questions are to be left in private hands, and when those hands are institutional, the state must respect the internal life and self-governance of such institutions. Most importantly, our approach is consistent with the duality of roles of religious institutions in contemporary America. When those institutions perform functions indistinguishable from other segments of the nonprofit world, the law should treat them as their secular counterparts are treated. When, however, religious institutions act in uniquely religious ways, making connections with the world beyond the temporal and material concerns that are the proper jurisdiction of the state, the legally distinctive qualities of such institutions begin to emerge. It is only by exploring the intrinsic limit on state power to affect these ultimate concerns, rather than by mining the desires, activities or teachings of religious organizations, that the distinctive place of religious entities in our constitutional order can be located.\(^56\)

Even if we are entirely correct that this vision of the state as a temporal entity accounts for constitutional norms of religious distinctiveness, we must articulate the details that follow from this insight. Issues of organizational commitment and leadership are obvious places to begin. If the state may mandate to a religious organization what its substantive commitments may include—for example, by dictating or limiting the contents of liturgical material—the state will have seized control of the organization’s vision of the ultimate. It is no surprise that the earliest American state constitutions protected each citizen’s right to worship God “according to the dictates of his own conscience,”\(^57\) and such a

---

56. Id. at 92. For further discussion of novus ordo seclorum, see FORREST MCDONALD, NOVUS ORDO SECLORUM: THE INTELLECTUAL ORIGINS OF THE CONSTITUTION (1985).

57. See, e.g., MASS. CONST. of 1780, art. II, reprinted in MICHAEL S. ARIENS & ROBERT A. DESTRO, RELIGIOUS LIBERTY IN A PLURALISTIC SOCIETY 49 (1996). As Ariens and Destro recount, such a guarantee appeared in a variety of forms in almost every early American state guarantee remains at the core of any and every theory of the religion clauses.

The substantive freedom of religious communities to chart their own vision of divine order has supported a pair of corollary freedoms that continue to find religion-distinctive protection in decisions linked to both the Free Exercise Clause and the Establishment Clause. The first is the right to settle, free from state interference, internal disputes whose resolution depends upon judgments about theological principles or issues of religious polity. If ownership and possession of church property, for example, turns on fidelity to religious texts or principles, and competing factions within the church each assert that it is the only group faithful to church teachings, courts cannot possibly adjudicate between the parties without judicial resolution of the true meaning of the faith. It is this dilemma that has led American courts, first as a matter of common law and now as a firm principle of constitutional law, to defer to the resolution reached by the religious polity as organized by the faith community.

No comparable doctrine of absolute deference exists with respect to disputes within business organizations or secular, nonprofit 58. Judicial decisions at times locate these doctrines of church autonomy in both religion clauses, see, e.g., EEOC v. Catholic Univ. of America, 83 F.3d 455 (D.C. Cir. 1996), as the organizers of this conference did by creating separate panels on Free Exercise and Nonestablishment approaches to church autonomy. For a variety of reasons explained below, it may matter greatly on which clause such doctrines rest. Because the Establishment Clause is a structural limitation on the role and power of the state, its prohibitions (unlike the rights protected by the Free Exercise Clause) may not be balanced against state interests and may not be “waived.” Officially sponsored prayer in public school, for example, is unconstitutional even if every parent of every child in the school gives explicit written permission to the state to sponsor such prayer. The Establishment Clause exists to keep the state out of the realm of ultimate concern, and private parties do not have authority to vest any such power in state institutions. For further exploration of the structural quality of the Establishment Clause, see Carl H. Esbeck, The Establishment Clause as a Structural Restraint: Validations and Ramifications, 18 J.L. & Pol. 445 (2002).

---

61. In hierarchical churches, deference is to the hierarchical authority; in congregational churches, deference is to the congregational polity. Cases in which religious denominations are organized in a mix of hierarchical and congregational forms, as is typical of the Presbyterian Church, present the greatest difficulty for courts. See, e.g., Presbyterian Church v. Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Mem’l Presbyterian Church, 393 U.S. 440 (1969). For a discussion of these polity forms and their significance, see Greenawalt, supra note 39, at 1848.
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

organizations, all of whom courts may hold in compliance with the substance of the organizations’ founding legal documents. For example, courts may resolve disputes among business partners according to the terms of a partnership agreement; settle disagreements between majority and minority shareholders of a corporation according to the terms of a corporate charter; and compel, in an appropriate action, a secular nonprofit organization to conform to trust instruments under which it operates. Religious entities thus possess a degree of autonomy over the resolution of internal disputes unlike any other known to the law, and this autonomy may not be surrendered by contract or other act of consent to state power. Courts may not rely on theological principles to resolve disputes, even if the parties so desire, and even if some immediate social good will be served thereby.

The second corollary freedom is the right to designate leaders and spokespersons for the faith. Those in such positions are the authors of each faith community’s continuing vision. They regulate its worship life, preside over changes in its liturgy and sense of values, and communicate its stories, beliefs, ethics, and sense of continuity from one generation to the next. State interference with the selection of leaders thus implicates the religious community’s method of transmitting its vision and cannot help but alter the content of the vision itself.

Here, too, the constitutional law of religious association protects the organizational interest in leadership selection and does so more thoroughly and completely than it protects the comparable interests of secular associations. Although the matter has never come up directly, no one would doubt that the First Amendment precludes

63. 59A AM. JUR. 2D Partnership § 120 (2004).
65. See 76 AM. JUR. 2D Partnership § 199(a) (1959).
66. As Professor Mansfield argues, this limitation on civil courts may deprive religious entities of state assistance upon which others are free to call. Mansfield, supra note 62, at 1169.
the state from instituting a system of licensure for the clergy. To do so would, in effect, impose a prior restraint on those who preach and give the state control, through criteria of education, character, or otherwise, over those who would speak in the name of a religious community. The clergy may be a learned profession, like medicine, law, architecture, or others, but the state may not create barriers to its entry. If a faith community chooses to ordain an illiterate ex-felon as its pastor, the state may not intervene or object.\textsuperscript{67}

Acting consistently with the norm against state licensure of clergy, the Supreme Court has on a number of occasions ruled against efforts to overturn the judgment of a religious institution with respect to a selection for church office.\textsuperscript{68} These decisions require the lower courts to categorically reject claims of breach of contract, or implied contract, to place or maintain a particular person in a religious office against the will of a religious organization.

As an outgrowth of these decisions, lower courts for many years have applied the doctrine of “ministerial exception” to a broad variety of norms that otherwise govern the employment relation. With respect to employees in a position of spokesperson for the faith—member of the clergy,\textsuperscript{69} professor of theology\textsuperscript{70} or canon law,\textsuperscript{71} director of religious music,\textsuperscript{72} and other positions, defined by \textsuperscript{67} See Mark E. Chopko, Stating Claims Against Religious Institutions, 44 B.C. L. REV. 1089, 1112–13 (2003).

\textsuperscript{68} Serbian E. Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevich, 426 U.S. 696 (1976); Gonzalez v. Roman Catholic Archbishop of Manila, 280 U.S. 1 (1929).

\textsuperscript{69} McClure v. Salvation Army, 460 F.2d 553 (5th Cir. 1972) (construing Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e, to exclude religious bodies, hiring for positions of religious significance, from the statutory prohibition on gender discrimination); accord Rayburn v. Gen. Conf. of Seventh-Day Adventists, 772 F.2d 1164 (4th Cir. 1985) (reaching the same result as McClure on constitutional grounds). For recent applications of the exception, see Callahan v. First Congregational Church, 808 N.E.2d 301 (Mass. 2004); Shalhebsabou v. Hebrew Home of Greater Wash., Inc., 363 F.3d 299 (4th Cir. 2004). The most prominent commentary on the ministerial exception remains Bruce Bagni, Discrimination in the Name of the Lord: A Critical Evaluation of Discrimination by Religious Organizations, 79 Colum. L. Rev. 1514 (1979). One of the authors of this article has been highly critical of the ministerial exception, see Ira C. Lupu, Free Exercise Exemptions and Religious Institutions: The Case of Employment Discrimination, 67 B.U. L. Rev. 391 (1987), but has since revised his position on it, see Distinctive Place, supra note 35, at 90, n.177.

\textsuperscript{70} EEOC v. Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, 651 F.2d 277 (5th Cir. 1981).

\textsuperscript{71} EEOC v. Catholic Univ. of Am., 83 F.3d 455 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (holding a church-controlled university constitutionally and statutorily immune from suit for sex discrimination in its refusal to tenure a female professor of canon law).

\textsuperscript{72} EEOC v. Roman Catholic Diocese of Raleigh, 213 F.3d 795 (4th Cir. 2000).
function rather than title—religious organizations are immune from claims that would entail judicial evaluation of an employee’s performance or a prospective employee’s qualifications.

The ministerial exemption is strikingly broad in its immunizing scope. For example, in its application to the law prohibiting sex discrimination in employment, the exemption is not limited to religious institutions that explicitly assert a preference for either sex for clergy positions. The exemption extends to all claims of sex discrimination in the hiring or conditions of employment of clergy, including assertions that a religious organization that purports to comply with norms of sex equality has covertly engaged in sex discrimination under the pretext of some sex-neutral policy. Courts have consistently ruled that to permit adjudication of such pretext claims would be to invite judicial second-guessing of institutional judgments about the performance of agents in leadership roles.

Here, too, as in the case of broad immunity from judicial determination of theological principle to resolve intrafaith disputes, no comparable doctrine of immunity exists with respect to leadership positions in other organizations, nonprofit or otherwise. Perhaps, as a matter of freedom of association, the NAACP may reserve its presidency to African-Americans. Can we imagine, however, that courts would be barred from adjudicating a claim of race discrimination against such an organization if it held itself out as hiring on a nondiscriminatory basis? Nothing in American law would support such a claim.

73. Virtually every case involving the application of the ministerial exception takes this form. See, e.g., Gellington v. Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, Inc., 203 F.3d 1299 (11th Cir. 2000) (rejecting a claim for unlawful retaliation brought by a pastor who advised a female minister about pursuing a sexual harassment claim against the church). We analyze Gellington, and the generic problem it presents, in considerable detail in Distinctive Place, supra note 35.

74. See cases cited at supra note 69.

75. The Supreme Court’s decision in Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000), protects the associational freedom of private, noncommercial groups to impose leadership or membership restrictions free from interference by the state’s laws against discrimination. Nothing in Dale, however, suggests that the Scouts (or any other comparable group) could take the position that it treated heterosexuals and homosexuals equally, but that it should remain free from state inquiry into whether it behaved in fidelity to its commitment to nondiscriminatory treatment. There are, of course, special difficulties associated with applying civil rights norms to high-level executive positions. See generally Elizabeth Bartholet, Application of Title VII to Jobs in High Places, 95 HARR. L. REV. 945 (1982). In his comment in this conference, Professor Sager argues that the ministerial exception should be grounded in a right of intimate association. See Eisgruber & Sager, supra note 52, at 1248–49. We doubt,
For reasons that we develop below, the regime of legal immunity for intrafaith disputes and for personnel matters involving spokespersons for the faith has quite properly survived the demise, decreed by Employment Division v. Smith,\textsuperscript{76} of a more general doctrine of religious exemptions. Smith held that religiously motivated claimants did not have a right under the Free Exercise Clause to remain exempt from religion-neutral, generally applicable laws.\textsuperscript{77} The laws of property, contract, and economic association that permit state resolution of intraorganizational disputes are indeed religion-neutral and generally applicable. The Smith opinion, however, explicitly recognizes the legal immunity of religious organizations from any civil adjudication that determines religious principle or structure.\textsuperscript{78}

Nor have the courts backtracked from the ministerial exception in the wake of Smith. In Equal Employment Opportunity Commission v. Catholic University of America,\textsuperscript{79} a leading and widely cited decision from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, the panel expressly reaffirmed the ministerial exception in the face of an argument that it should not survive Smith. The decision upheld a district court ruling that constitutional immunities barred adjudication of Sister Elizabeth McDonough’s complaint that unlawful sex discrimination had infected Catholic University’s decision to deny her tenure.

The Catholic University decision is worth noting in some detail. It is a thorough, well-developed opinion by a prominent court on the scope of the ministerial exemption and its continued vitality. Sister McDonough’s tenure application had gone through a series of petitions and appeals to the faculty of Canon Law, the Committee on Appointments and Promotions of the University’s School of Religious Studies, and a comparable committee of the University’s Academic Senate.\textsuperscript{80} The process went on for over a year, ending with the Senate Committee’s unanimous vote against a tenure

\textsuperscript{76} 494 U.S. 872 (1990).
\textsuperscript{77} Id. at 879.
\textsuperscript{78} Id. at 877.
\textsuperscript{79} 83 F.3d 455 (D.C. Cir. 1996).
\textsuperscript{80} Id. at 458–59.
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

The Committee’s primary reason for its decision was that “[t]he scholarship of the candidate [did] not measure up to the standards expected in the field for the granting of tenure.”

Sister McDonough then filed a complaint with the EEOC alleging unlawful sex discrimination. The Commission undertook a two-year investigation and made unsuccessful efforts at conciliation. The EEOC and Sister McDonough thereupon brought suit against the University, and the case eventually went to trial, but the University did not raise the ministerial exception defense. A week into the trial, after hearing competing expert testimony on the quality of Sister McDonough’s scholarship compared to that of men who had been granted tenure in the Canon Law Department at the University, District Judge Oberdorfer asked the parties to brief the question of constitutional immunity. After they did so, he dismissed the case, holding that Sister McDonough’s role in instructing members of the Catholic clergy in Canon Law made her functionally equivalent to a minister. The Free Exercise Clause therefore barred review of the decision. He also ruled that the Establishment Clause barred adjudication of her claim because it required impermissible judicial evaluation of the merits of scholarship in Canon Law, a theological subject. Moreover, the EEOC investigation itself involved impermissible procedural entanglement between the government and a religious institution.

On appeal, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit synthesized Supreme Court decisions on intrafaith disputes and lower court decisions applying the ministerial exemption, focusing on what it saw as the central issue in the case—whether a Professor of Canon Law at Catholic University would have “essentially

81. Id. at 459.
82. Id. The Committee also stated that the candidate had made a contribution to “service and the practice of canon law,” but that this did not “counterbalance the marginal performance in teaching and scholarly publications” and that the divided vote in other voting groups that had reviewed her application did not give sufficient assurance that Sister McDonough possessed the “optimal qualifications for the position.” Id. (internal citations omitted).
83. The procedural history summarized in this paragraph can be found in id. at 459–60.
84. Id. at 459.
85. Id.
86. Id.
88. Id. at 12.
religious" functions. Judge Buckley’s opinion concluded that her primary duties would consist of teaching and spreading the faith. The court buttressed its conclusion with an emphasis on the particular role played by Catholic University, whose Canon Law Department “is the sole entity in the United States empowered by the Vatican to confer ecclesiastical degrees in canon law.” In addition, over the ten years preceding the litigation, the department had awarded the great majority of its graduate degrees to priests or members of religious orders, a fact which led the court to conclude that the department played a central role “in the graduate education of American priests.”

Having analyzed in close detail the functions of Sister McDonough’s position and the role of canon law at both Catholic University and in the Church as a whole, the court affirmed the dismissal of the case. It concluded that the Free Exercise Clause (even after Smith) protected the University against a court substituting its judgment for that of University agents on the merits of Sister McDonough’s scholarship and that the Establishment Clause prohibited the kinds of substantive and procedural entanglements that had been produced by EEOC investigation and district court litigation, including discovery and trial.

The opinion in the Catholic University case is noteworthy in several respects. First, it quite appropriately parsed the functions of 89. 83 F.3d at 463.

90. Id. at 464.
91. Id.
92. Id.
93. The court also held that the Religious Freedom Restoration Act still applied to the federal government and that it too required dismissal of the action. Id. at 467–69. A concurring opinion by Judge Henderson, id. at 470–76, expressed the view that the district court, by careful management, might have remained within the Constitution and still assessed whether the school’s determination about Sister McDonough’s scholarship had been a pretext for sex discrimination. Judge Henderson believed that the district court should have limited itself to the evidence of scholarly quality that had been considered by the University’s reviewing committees and not taken outside, expert testimony from ecclesiastical sources on the quality of the work. Id. at 472–75. Judge Henderson concurred in the result, however, on the ground that the remedies sought by Sister McDonough, including reinstatement with tenure, would interfere with the final authority of the Vatican to appoint tenured professors in the Canon Law Department at Catholic University. Id. at 476.
the job to see if it was religiously distinctive; had Sister McDonough been a professor of mathematics, the school presumably would not have had a comparable immunity. Second, it approvingly noted the district court’s sua sponte focus on the ministerial exception and the questions of forbidden entanglement; these concerns relate to the subject matter jurisdiction of the courts, and a party’s willingness to litigate cannot waive a jurisdictional requirement. Whatever institutional reasons may have moved the University to contest Sister McDonough’s claim of sex discrimination on its merits, rather than to assert its immunity, civil courts may not render judgments on theological questions.94

We believe that the D.C. Circuit reached the correct result in Catholic University, but we also believe that the court—like virtually every other court that has confronted questions of ecclesiastical immunity—misanalyzed the problem in one critically important respect. Ecclesiastical immunities, including the ministerial exception, are not the offspring of rights in the conventional sense. They are not the legal entitlements of religious entities in the way that, for example, authors and political advocates possess rights to communicate. Instead, ecclesiastical immunities are the entailments of the jurisdictional limitations that the Establishment Clause imposes upon the state’s role.95 Because the state is forbidden from being the author or coauthor of religious faith, it may not adjudicate or regulate the ways in which communities of faith are organized. Nor may the state select the voices which lead these communities, nor the lessons they communicate. Religious entities cannot waive this jurisdictional limitation, which we believe resides most comfortabably in the Establishment Clause (even as it furthers Free Exercise values). Hence the district court judge correctly decided to stop the trial on the merits of Sister McDonough’s claim. Moreover, no state assertion of countervailing state interests, compelling or otherwise, may operate to set aside this limitation. The Catholic University decision remains correct, regardless of the governmental interest in combating sex discrimination in employment.

94. The least well-explained element in Catholic University is the assertion of the court’s procedural concern about “excessive entanglement” independent of the substantive merits of the ministerial exception. Id. at 466–67. The question of procedural entanglement is one that is omnipresent in the process of discovery and trial in tort cases involving claims of sexual misconduct and defenses of ecclesiastical immunity, and we shall return to it in the next part of this paper. See infra Part IV.B.2.b(ii).

One additional development in American law sheds further light on ecclesiastical immunity and its constitutional underpinnings. About twenty years ago, in Nally v. Grace Community Church, a California court awarded summary judgment against a pastor and his church to a family whose son had committed suicide after undergoing a series of counseling sessions with the pastor. The theory of the litigation was clergy malpractice—that is, that members of the clergy were legally obliged to follow objective standards of care in counseling parishioners, and that this pastor had failed to follow such standards. A California appellate court soon reversed the judgment on the theory that the First Amendment precludes civil judges and juries from deciding what standards of care a reasonably prudent and trained clergyman should follow. We think Nally must be correct because any such inquiry would inevitably take judges and juries into the heart of theological arrangements and would inevitably be biased against non-mainstream faiths. Since Nally, almost every American court that has been presented with a claim for clergy malpractice—i.e., a claim that requires civil authorities to articulate and apply objective standards of care for the communicative content of clergy counseling—has rejected the claim on grounds of ecclesiastical immunity.

97. Id. at 304–05.
98. Id.
100. See William W. Bassett, Religious Institutions and the Law § 8:19 n.9 (listing cases). The one exception seems to be Byrd v. Faber, 565 N.E.2d 584 (Ohio 1991), which leaves open the possibility of a clergy malpractice claim (though the court does not allow such a claim in this case). The quickly aborted development of the tort of clergy malpractice does not imply that clergy and their supervisors are perpetually safe from liability for their performance as counselors. As we document and assess in Part IV of this paper, courts have held a substantial number of clergy, and a smaller but significant number of their supervisors, liable for sexual exploitation in counseling relationships with adult parishioners. The courts that have affirmed imposition of such liability have based their rulings on a theory of fiduciary duty, which some, but by no means all, courts assert is an approach that avoids the constitutional pitfalls associated with the tort of clergy malpractice. For now, we hold this question for the general discussion in Part IV, below.
In a number of recent lawsuits arising out of alleged sexual misconduct, defendant religious organizations have asserted some version of ecclesiastical immunity as defenses. Defendants have claimed that the disputes are internal and therefore beyond the reach of judicial resolution. Additionally, defendants have at times argued that tort claims arising out of sexual misconduct of clergy inevitably implicate the policies behind the ministerial exception because the adjudication of such claims involves questions about the ordination, assignment, supervision, and retention of such clergy. Some courts have been receptive to blanket claims of immunity, but many have not. At least one academic commentator, writing from within the Catholic tradition, has expressed the concern that broad assertions of immunity from tort claims against supervisors and religious entities will not only fail but will poison the well in ways that render courts deeply resistant to more reasonable assertions of ecclesiastical immunity.

Cases involving clergy sexual misconduct, especially those that include criminal sexual assaults on children, implicate the state’s legitimate and deep concerns to protect the bodily and psychic integrity of its citizens. When, however, such controversies reach beyond the offending clergyman to the substance and process of clergy selection, assignment, and retention, the controversies cannot help but touch the institutional arrangements and theological understandings that inform the structure of faith communities and their leadership.

The tensions between protecting innocent victims of sexual misconduct and maintaining ecclesiastical immunities for distinctively 102. Compare Bear Valley Church of Christ v. DeBose, 928 P.2d 1315 (Colo. 1996) (permitting a claim against a church for negligent employment arising out of a pastor’s molestation of a child), with Bryan R. v. Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc’y, 738 A.2d 839 (Me. 1999) (holding that the First Amendment bars such claims against religious institutions). We discuss these trends, and cite cases supporting them, in Part IV.B.2.b, infra. Professor Idleman’s important work also documents such trends in detail. Idleman, supra note 20.

104. We believe that we have looked at every case ever decided by an American court involving sexual misconduct by a member of the clergy. To our knowledge, all but one of the allegedly offending clergy in these cases have been men. The sole exception is found in Barquin v. Roman Catholic Diocese of Burlington, 839 F. Supp. 275 (D. Vt. 1993) (alleging sexual abuse of a child by an unnamed Sister Jane Doe).
religious activity are palpable. How can they be resolved? The conventional but thoroughly unproductive way to approach this problem is to argue that the Free Exercise Clause exempts certain religious conduct from generally applicable norms of tort and criminal law. For a variety of reasons, this approach is a dead end. First, religious actors and institutions never claim that the sexual misconduct itself is religion-based. As a result, courts quickly repudiate any notion that religious liberty requires consideration of an exemption for such behavior. Second, the regimes of Employment Division v. Smith\textsuperscript{105} and Jones v. Wolf\textsuperscript{106} appear to intersect in a focus on “neutral principles,” meaning principles that do not single out religion for disfavored treatment. Even though Smith appears to preserve a realm of church autonomy for resolution of internal disputes, it is all too easy to distinguish cases of property and contract, which involve voluntary private ordering, from cases of tort and crime, which involve coercive harm to third parties. Smith repudiates any exemptions for religious actors from general rules in this latter category.\textsuperscript{107} Third, even if Smith were overruled, or if state law recognizes the possibility of exemptions, the state has many compelling interests in preventing predatory sexual behavior.\textsuperscript{108} Moreover, the relevant law of tort and crime is sufficiently well tailored to that end that courts are unlikely to narrow the ambit of such rules in the name of free exercise.

Does the failure of the model of free exercise exemptions necessarily lead to the death of ecclesiastical immunities from law designed to control sexual misconduct? Two important possibilities lead us to argue that it does not. First, the Free Exercise Clause protects religious actors and institutions against discrimination in both the content of the law and its application. Clergy misconduct cases may at times be subtle vehicles for just such discrimination. Second, jurisdictional limits on the state, as manifest in the

\textsuperscript{105} 494 U.S. 872 (1990).
\textsuperscript{106} 443 U.S. 595 (1979).
\textsuperscript{107} 494 U.S. at 889–90.
\textsuperscript{108} For a recent illustration of the judicial tendency to treat state interests in such cases as sufficiently weighty to overcome objections rooted in religious liberty, see Society of Jesus of New England v. Commonwealth, 808 N.E.2d 272, 281–83 (Mass. 2004) (noting that the Commonwealth’s interest in obtaining evidence of a sexual crime by a priest against high school students is sufficiently compelling, under Massachusetts constitutional law, to overcome an objection to producing documentation of conversations between the defendant and investigators acting on behalf of a religious order).
IV. SEXUAL MISCONDUCT AND ECCLESIASTICAL IMMUNITY

Civil and criminal actions involving sexual abuse by religious leaders involve many different claims and charges. Some arise specifically from the sexual misconduct itself, while others arise out of the religious organization’s duties to avoid or respond to such misconduct. In this Part, we focus first on those claims and charges that relate most narrowly to the act or acts of sexual abuse, including criminal charges of sexual assault and civil actions for breach of fiduciary obligations. We then turn to the broader assertions of organizational liability, which include civil claims for breaches of institutional fiduciary duty, negligent hiring or supervision, and perhaps criminal charges for failure to protect children.

Our overarching theses can be reduced to several relatively straightforward propositions. First, clergy who commit sexual crimes should never have valid defenses based on ecclesiastical immunity. Second, clergy who sexually exploit their followers in noncriminal ways may be in breach of fiduciary duties, but the Free Exercise Clause requires that the law frame those duties in ways that do not single out clergy for disfavored treatment. Third, similar considerations of equal treatment should inform the analysis of fiduciary duties owed by religious institutions to the sexual victims of their clergy; courts must take special care lest they subject religious institutions to uniquely onerous legal obligations. Fourth, claims against religious institutions for negligent employment of clergy must be reconciled with First Amendment considerations of ecclesiastical autonomy. We suggest that the regime of New York Times v. Sullivan, applicable to a different conflict between principles of tort law and First Amendment freedoms, may be a useful starting place for thinking about a similar reconciliation in this context. Finally, we believe that criminal investigations of, and plea negotiations with, religious entities must be conducted with constitutional sensitivity to limits on the state’s role in the selection and retention of clergy.
A. The Wrongdoer’s Criminal and Civil Liability for Sexual Misconduct

Every American jurisdiction criminalizes, and makes tortious, sexual contact with persons below a specified age of consent. Ecclesiastical immunity has never barred criminal prosecution or civil actions for a religious leader’s violation of these laws. The reasons are obvious. Few would be willing to defend such conduct by claiming that their religious commitments included sexual interaction between adults and minors, or that a government investigation into such interaction would impermissibly entangle the state in religious matters. Were such defenses raised, courts would emphatically reject them on grounds that the public interest in protecting children vastly outweighs any claim of religious privilege, and that investigation and adjudication of the sexual abuse of children can proceed without state intrusion into questions of religious doctrine or governance.

In some circumstances, sexual contact with adults presents equally simple cases. If the sexual contact involves physical coercion, or the adult lacks full mental capacity to consent, then both criminal and civil laws will condemn the conduct. As with sexual abuse of children, ecclesiastical immunity offers no shelter to a religious leader who has violated these norms.

In the absence of physical coercion, however, sexual relationships between religious leaders and mentally competent adults present significantly more complicated issues. Consensual sexual conduct between competent adults does not generally give rise to criminal or civil liability. The torts of seduction and criminal conversation, under which a paramour could be sued for luring a woman into a sexual

109. In many states, the age at which a minor may legally consent to sexual relations is higher when the relationship is with a person in a position of trust and authority. See, e.g., COLO. REV. STAT. §§ 18-3-405, 18-3-405.3 (2004) (prohibiting sexual contact with a child under the age of fifteen, except when the person having contact is in a position of trust, in which case the age of consent is eighteen); see also Bohrer v. DeHart, 943 P.2d 1220, 1227 (Colo. App. 1996) (discussing a Colorado provision governing the sexual assault of a child by a person in a position of trust), vacated, First United Methodist Church v. Bohrer, No. 96SC490, 1997 Colo. LEXIS 24 (Jan. 13, 1997).

110. See, e.g., Society of Jesus of New England, 808 N.E.2d 272 (rejecting the Society’s claim of constitutional privilege for documents pertaining to the criminal investigation into clergy sexual misconduct). The privilege unsuccessfully asserted in this case was broader than the priest-penitent privilege recognized by state law.

111. See, e.g., MINN. STAT. § 609.344(1)(d) (2003) (prohibiting sexual contact with a mentally impaired person).
relationship, are long dead in most jurisdictions.\footnote{112} Therefore, our legal analysis in this section turns on a fundamental question: what makes sexual interaction between a clergyman and congregant different than an ordinary, nonactionable, consensual sexual relationship between two adults? The problem is more intricate than it might initially appear. As we analyze this question, we focus on those qualities of clergy-congregant relationships that give rise to such liability in the secular counterparts to those interactions. Where courts can identify and apply criteria that encompass secular as well as religious roles, the liability of clergy for noncriminal sexual relationships may appropriately follow. By contrast, clergy-specific triggers of liability offend constitutional norms against disfavoring religion.\footnote{113}

The standard (but constitutionally inadequate) answer to the question we ask in this section identifies the clergy-congregant relationship as special—one that imposes heightened obligations on the clergyman not to exploit parishioners under his care.\footnote{114} The special quality of this relationship may, however, arise from the clergyman’s practice of professional techniques that are essentially secular, rather than from his religious role.\footnote{115} In most jurisdictions,

\begin{itemize}
\item \footnote{113 For a recent recognition of this problem, see Wende C. v. United Methodist Church, 776 N.Y.S.2d 390, 394 (N.Y. App. Div. 2004) (“[T]o impose greater liability [for battery] on an adulterer who happens to be a minister than on any other adulterer would, in our view, violate constitutional principles.”).}
\item \footnote{114 See generally Janice D. Villiers, Clergy Malpractice Revisited: Liability for Sexual Misconduct in the Counseling Relationship, 74 Denv. U. L. Rev. 1, 37–48 (1996) (arguing that the relationship between clergy and congregant is fiduciary in character, and sexual contact within that relationship is a breach of the fiduciary’s duty).}
\item \footnote{115 See, e.g., Sanders v. Casa View Baptist Church, 134 F.3d 331, 336–37 (5th Cir. 1998) (upholding a claim against a clergy member for professional negligence in his practice of essentially secular marriage counseling).}
\end{itemize}
psychotherapists, social workers, and others who hold themselves out as secular counselors face tort liability, criminal responsibility, and professional discipline for sexual exploitation of their patients.116 When clergy publicly advertise their availability to provide such counseling, perform the counseling in clinical settings similar to those of a secular counselor, and receive payment for rendering the service, they invite the application of the same standards applied to others similarly trained. If a pastor provided medical services as a trained and licensed physician in addition to her duties as a pastor, and was alleged to have negligently set a broken arm, no court would take seriously a claim for ecclesiastical immunity from medical malpractice.117 There is no more justification for recognizing such immunity for a pastor who practices secular therapy.

Claims of sexual misconduct by secular counselors typically sound in professional malpractice, on the theory that a therapist has mishandled the strong emotional bonds that often arise between therapist and patient.118 To the extent that a clergyman has undergone training in secular modes of therapy, held himself out as qualified to perform such therapeutic techniques, and induced a patient to rely on that expertise, the law should hold the clergy-counselor to answer for therapeutic malpractice in that vocation as well.119

With few exceptions, however, courts have been unwilling to impose malpractice liability on clergy-counselors.120 This

116. See, e.g., MINN. STAT. §§ 609.345(h)-(j) (2003) (establishing a criminal prohibition on sex between mental health practitioners and their patients); see also id. § 609.345(l) (extending criminal prohibition to sexual contact between clergy and congregant, when sex arises from counseling relationship).

117. Dausch v. Rykse, 52 F.3d 1425, 1433 (7th Cir. 1994). The court in Dausch explained the distinction between these two realms of action:

[T]oday, religious groups offer their adherents, and sometimes the entire community, services that were not offered by ecclesiastical sources in the past. Few would doubt, however, that a lawyer practicing in a legal clinic operated by a church or a physician practicing in a clinic under church auspices would have to comply with the same standards of professional care and responsibility as any other law firm or medical facility.

Id.

118. Id. at 1435; Mullen v. Horton, 700 A.2d 1377, 1380–81 (Conn. App. Ct. 1997); see also Villiers, supra note 114, at 43–45.

119. Sanders, 134 F.3d at 337–38.

120. See, e.g., Destefano v. Grabrian, 763 P.2d 275, 283–86 (Colo. 1988) (permitting a breach of fiduciary duty claim in a suit over sexual misconduct of a pastoral counselor, but rejecting plaintiff’s claim of malpractice in counseling).
unwillingness dates back to the landmark case Nally v. Grace Community Church of the Valley. In Nally, as we discussed above, plaintiffs alleged that their son had received negligent pastoral counseling at a church and that the pastors’ negligence was responsible for their son’s suicide. After an intermediate appellate court allowed plaintiffs to sue on a theory of clergy malpractice, the California Supreme Court reversed. The court reasoned that imposition of malpractice liability for negligent pastoral counseling would involve the court in judgments about the “religious philosophy of the particular denomination or ecclesiastical teachings of the religious entity.”

Courts have good reason to reject claims of clergy malpractice when such claims invite the court to determine the standard of pastoral care for a “reasonable Catholic priest” or a “reasonable Orthodox rabbi.” These are judgments that only that particular religious tradition can render and are precisely the kinds of appraisals that the doctrine of ecclesiastical immunity bars. In Nally, the church and its pastors did not advertise their competence to perform secular therapy but instead offered thickly religious counseling. The court found that it could not adjudicate plaintiff’s claim without determining a standard of care for reasonable spiritual counseling and that the Constitution prohibits such a determination.

In order to avoid the need for a court to find a standard of care for the “reasonable clergyman,” plaintiffs and courts have looked to the law of fiduciaries as an alternative legal basis for recognizing the special relationship between clergy and congregation. In Destefano v. Grabrian, the leading case involving a priest’s sexual relationship with a woman he was counseling, the Supreme Court of Colorado rejected plaintiff’s claim of clergy malpractice. The court, however, did allow her to proceed on a theory that the priest had breached his fiduciary duty to her.

122. Id. at 960.
125. 763 P.2d 275 (Colo. 1988).
126. Id. at 285.
Edna's first claim for relief alleges that Grabrian, in his position as a priest and as one who holds himself out to the community as a professional or trained marriage counselor, breached his fiduciary duty to her. A fiduciary is a person having a duty, created by his undertaking, to act primarily for the benefit of another in matters connected with the undertaking. A fiduciary has a duty to deal “with utmost good faith and solely for the benefit” of the beneficiary. . . . A fiduciary’s obligations to the beneficiary include, among other things, a duty of loyalty, . . . a duty to exercise reasonable care and skill, . . . and a duty to deal impartially with beneficiaries . . . .

A person standing in a fiduciary relationship with another is subject to liability to the other for harm resulting from a breach of the duty imposed by the relationship. . . . We have no difficulty in finding that Grabrian, as a marriage counselor to Robert and Edna, owed a fiduciary duty to Edna. His duty to Edna was “created by his undertaking” to counsel her. Grabrian had a duty, given the nature of the counseling relationship, to engage in conduct designed to improve the Destefanos’ marital relationship. As a fiduciary, he was obligated not to engage in conduct which might harm the Destefanos’ relationship. If the allegations are true, it is clear to us that Grabrian breached his duty and obligation when he had sexual intercourse with Edna.127

The Destefano court also held that Grabrian had no plausible constitutional defense to the breach of fiduciary claim because the alleged misconduct was “not an expression of sincerely held religious belief.”128

Three aspects of the Destefano court’s fiduciary analysis suggest constitutional weaknesses in this approach. First, the Destefano court limited its constitutional analysis to the Free Exercise Clause and summarily dismissed any defenses based on that clause because “the alleged wrongdoing of [the] cleric clearly [fell] outside the beliefs and doctrine of his religion.”129 As we discussed above, courts and litigants too frequently mischaracterize the constitutional roots of ecclesiastical immunity, which rest not in an individual’s claim of religious liberty but rather in the court’s recognition of the state’s limited jurisdiction. Few clerics claim that they have a religious 127. Id. at 284 (citations omitted).

128. Id.
129. Id.
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity justification for engaging in sex with their congregants, but that is not the proper constitutional inquiry. The doctrine of ecclesiastical immunity requires the court to determine whether, and on what terms, it is competent to impose the standards of civil law on the clergy-congregant relationship.

Second, the court’s expansive definition of the fiduciary’s obligations makes this cause of action virtually indistinguishable from malpractice, a claim that the court rejects because it “raises serious first amendment issues.” In addition to the duties of loyalty to and impartiality among beneficiaries, the court recognizes a duty to “exercise reasonable care and skill” in carrying out the fiduciary’s responsibilities. One might prove a breach of the duty of loyalty, and perhaps also a breach of the duty of impartiality, without reference to a standard of care, but “reasonable care and skill” obviously depend on a standard of the “reasonably careful fiduciary.” The Destefano court does not explain how application of the reasonable fiduciary standard differs in any way from the constitutionally impermissible adjudication of the reasonable priest standard—and not one of the courts that has followed the Destefano court’s analysis has offered an explanation either.

Third, and most importantly, the court held that the relationship between priest and counselee imposed fiduciary obligations on the priest as a matter of law and that sexual contact between such a fiduciary and his beneficiary constituted a breach of the fiduciary’s duties. These two determinations—first, identifying a fiduciary relationship, and second, designating sexual contact between fiduciary and beneficiary as a breach thereof—represent the fulcrum

130. Id. at 285.
131. Id. at 284.
134. Destefano, 763 P.2d at 284. In his concurring opinion, Justice Quinn makes this point more clearly: “No one can reasonably dispute the fact that the relation between a Catholic priest and a person of the same faith who is receiving marriage counseling from the priest is in a fiduciary relation founded on utmost trust and confidence.” Id. at 289 (Quinn, J., concurring).
upon which rest Destefano and its substantial progeny.135 They also represent the point at which careful constitutional analysis is most needed yet least often found in the decisions.

To establish the existence of a fiduciary relationship, the plaintiff is typically required to prove the following elements, as articulated in Langford v. Roman Catholic Diocese of Brooklyn:136

1) The vulnerability of one party to the other which 2) results in the empowerment of the stronger party by the weaker which 3) empowerment has been solicited or accepted by the stronger party and 4) prevents the weaker party from effectively protecting itself.137

For our purposes, the most constitutionally significant elements are the first two—the source of the plaintiff’s vulnerability to the defendant cleric. Some courts have held that such vulnerability is the result of a “power imbalance between a clergy person and a parishioner.”138 Put more starkly, the cleric’s “fiduciary position is derived from his position as a pastor in his church.”139 We have searched diligently and have found no decisions in which courts have deemed leaders of non-religious voluntary associations to stand in fiduciary relationships with adult members of the association. If, as may be the case, the law is treating religious leaders differently, is such a disparity justified?

Any answer that focuses on the peculiar nature of religious belief rests on dubious constitutional ground. In a careful consideration of this question, a California appellate court rejected a plaintiff’s breach of fiduciary duty claim when the alleged duty was based on the religious relationship between priest and parishioner:

[T]he crucial questions [of] whether appellant was vulnerable to Reverend Namocatcat and unable to protect herself effectively would focus sharply on the nature and depth of her religious faith and its basis, if any, in Roman Catholic doctrine. These are, of course, profoundly religious questions, as to which courts may not constitutionally inquire.\(^\text{140}\)

This constitutional limitation stems from the basic legal definition of a fiduciary relationship as an entrustment by one who is vulnerable to one who is not only stronger but who has also induced or accepted the vulnerable one’s entrustment. In short, the fiduciary relationship requires intentional action by both the weaker and the stronger. To determine whether a religious relationship should give rise to a fiduciary obligation, a court would need to examine the religious understandings of parishioner and priest. It is possible, of course, that the parties will hold consonant religious understandings of the relationship.\(^\text{141}\) It is equally possible, however, that the parties will assert divergent understandings.

How would a court resolve this difference? Several courts seem to rely solely on the subjective religious views of the plaintiff,\(^\text{142}\) but that approach effectively—and unconstitutionally—discriminates against religious defendants by imposing fiduciary obligations on them through the unilateral action of the alleged beneficiary. The alternative is no more constitutionally acceptable. If the plaintiff and defendant disagree about the religious meaning of the relationship, the court will need to decide between the rival understandings. Whether the judge or the jury makes this determination, the constitutional offense is the same. A court may no more determine the “true” theological meaning of a clergy-congregant relationship than it may determine the standard of a reasonable cleric, or who should be imam of a mosque, or which faction in an intrachurch dispute is more faithful to church teaching.

\(^{140}\) Richelle L., 130 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 618.

\(^{141}\) See F.G. v. MacDonell, 696 A.2d 697, 702 (N.J. 1997) (noting that a priest admitted in a deposition that sex with parishioner violated his fiduciary obligation to her).

\(^{142}\) Martinelli v. Bridgeport Roman Catholic Diocesan Corp., 196 F.3d 409 (2d Cir. 1999) (“Where a person’s beliefs are alleged to give rise to a special legal relationship between him and his church, we may be required to consider with other relevant evidence the nature of that person’s beliefs in order properly to determine whether the asserted relationship in fact exists.”).

A fiduciary relationship between clergy and congregant must be grounded in something other than its religious character. The vast majority of cases of clergy sexual misconduct with adult victims, including Destefano, arise from counseling relationships. As we argued above, the Constitution does not bar adjudication of claims where the clergyman has held himself out as willing and capable to provide secular counseling. Secular considerations—such as the vulnerability of one who seeks therapy, induced and accepted by one who offers such services—establish the fiduciary character of the counseling relationship. Courts will judge according to secular standards whether and to what extent a cleric-therapist who initiates a sexual relationship with his counselee has, in so doing, violated the obligations of one who offers such therapy. It matters little whether the plaintiff’s claims are styled as therapist malpractice or a breach of fiduciary duties because courts will measure the standard of care using a reasonable practitioner standard from the secular therapy at issue.

More constitutionally problematic, however, are cases in which the cleric did not hold himself out as offering secular therapeutic counseling but did provide religious counseling to a parishioner with whom he engaged in sexual misconduct. To assess such cases, it is important first to understand that the act of counseling does not create a legal relationship such that any sexual contact between the counselor and counselee constitutes actionable misconduct. Informal counseling between friends may lead to sexual intimacy, but the entrustment of confidences and its attendant vulnerabilities do not transform this intimacy into a breach of fiduciary duties.

143. In an astute reply to our paper, Bill Marshall asserts that courts might properly ground such fiduciary relationships in a religion-neutral theory of dependence and trust. See William P. Marshall, Separation, Neutrality, and Clergy Liability for Sexual Misconduct, 2004 BYU L. Rev. 1921. In particular, he argues that leaders of any organization, religious or secular, might have fiduciary duties toward their followers. If we were confident that such duties could be articulated in a religion-neutral way, and rest on relational qualities that are not distinctively religious, we would be inclined to agree with Professor Marshall. We have, however, never come across a decided case in which any such liability has been imposed on a secular leader.

144. See Richelle L, 130 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 612 (listing cases arising out of sexual relationships in the religious counseling context).
Nor does the fact that two legally competent adults stand in a fiduciary relationship with one another mean that any sexual contact between the two is necessarily a breach of the fiduciary’s duties. Sex between a stockbroker and client or a trustee and beneficiary creates no greater legal liability than that between any two adult strangers.\textsuperscript{145} Even the relationship between a physician and patient, with its legally privileged confidential conversations about treatment, is not one in which sexual contact represents a per se actionable breach of fiduciary duty.\textsuperscript{146}

In cases that have recognized fiduciary duty claims arising from sexual relationships between a doctor and patient, courts have typically focused on one of several special factors that would overcome the patient’s capacity to give effective consent to intimate contact. Courts find physicians to have breached a fiduciary duty when they have induced a patient to engage in sex by representing that the sex is part of the course of treatment,\textsuperscript{147} though such inducement may be better characterized as a form of fraud. As we discussed above, courts regularly hold that a physician has breached his fiduciary obligation if he offers therapeutic counseling, and the sexual relationship arises out of the therapeutic bonds.\textsuperscript{148} In the absence of such factors, however, courts have been reluctant to hold physicians liable for engaging in sexual relationships with their patients, even if such conduct represents a serious breach of standards of professional ethics.

What, then, of a sexual relationship between a cleric and his congregate, when the affair does not arise out of secular therapeutic counseling? If courts deciding such cases follow the decisions of cases involving sex between physicians and patients, they should be reticent about finding civil liability, even though no one defends the moral propriety of the sexual relationship. In particular, courts should avoid the temptation to impose heightened liability on... religious leaders because of the leaders’ “sacred” position. Unfortunately, some courts have not resisted this temptation, as exemplified by F.G. v. MacDonnell, in which the Supreme Court of New Jersey wrote:

Ordinarily, consenting adults must bear the consequences of their conduct, including sexual conduct. In the sanctuary of the church, however, troubled parishioners should be able to seek pastoral counseling free from the fear that the counselors will sexually abuse them. Our decision does no more than extend to the defenseless the same protection that the dissent would extend to infants and incompetents.

In the F.G. court’s reasoning, the religious quality of pastoral counseling is a crucial element of the parishioner’s vulnerability. Trust in the pastoral relationship arises because parishioners “turn to their pastor in the belief that their religion is the most likely source to sustain them in their time of trouble.”

The F.G. court’s language raises serious constitutional concerns that the court deployed civil law to enforce religious obligations—securing “the sanctuary of the church” for “troubled parishioners” who should be able find solace in their pastor’s care. Although the court refers at times to the duties of secular psychotherapists, the court does not rest the duties of a pastoral counselor on the cleric’s practice of secular therapeutic techniques. Instead, the court explicitly grounds the duties of a pastoral counselor in the religious qualities of the relationship between clergy and congregant. The court’s rationale does not depend in any way on counseling as a course of treatment and would just as easily encompass the act of sacramental confession. The F.G. decision thus reflects precisely the same constitutional defect as those that regard clergy to be fiduciaries of their congregants as a matter of law. Both approaches impose special legal status on the religious character of a relationship.

In rejecting the approach taken in F.G., we do not conclude that sex between a cleric and his congregant is actionable only if the cleric

---

149. 696 A.2d 697 (N.J. 1997).
150. Id. at 705. This passage was quoted, with approval, by the Florida Supreme Court in Doe v. Evans, 814 So. 2d 370, 375 (Fla. 2002), another case involving sexual misconduct in a religious counseling relationship.
151. Id. at 564.
152. See Mansfield, supra note 62, at 1170 (finding the civil duty to act or not act in a certain way may not be based on “a church’s own law, customs, or traditions”).
is engaged in the practice of secular therapeutic counseling. We do believe, however, that judicial assessment of sexual relationships between clergy and parishioners requires heightened sensitivity to the constitutional problems inherent in such adjudications. At a minimum, courts should not hold religious defendants to a heightened standard of care because of their religious character. This protection would likely require courts to inspect closely the plaintiff's case to determine if it contains sufficient evidence, not dependant upon religion-specific characteristics, of both a fiduciary relationship and breach of the attendant duty. In the absence of such evidence, the court should not permit the case to go to the jury.

To illustrate how such a case might proceed, we return to the analogous situation of sexual relationships between patients and physicians. In recent years, several courts have held that a physician may be liable for engaging in sex with his patient, even if the physician did not offer therapeutic counseling or represent that sex was part of the medical treatment. For example, in McCracken v. Walls-Kaufman, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals permitted a woman to proceed with a breach of fiduciary duty claim against her chiropractor, arising from the chiropractor’s sexual contact with her during her course of treatment. The court recognized that the chiropractor’s conduct did not fit within the normal categories for holding “a person engaged in the healing arts” liable for having sex with his patients. He was not engaged in the practice of psychotherapy, he did not hold himself out as a therapeutic counselor, and he did not “represent[] to the patient that sex is a part of the treatment.” Nevertheless, the court reversed the trial court’s dismissal of the patient’s claim and held that such liability could also extend to contexts in which a health practitioner “become[s] engaged in giving counsel or advice to patients similar to that usually given by psychologists or psychologists.” The plaintiff alleged that the chiropractor invited

154. 717 A.2d 346.
155. Id. at 352.
156. Id. at 351.
157. Id.
158. Id. at 353.
discussion of personal matters during her treatments, provided advice and counseling to her on such matters, and knew that she was especially vulnerable because of an addiction to Valium.\textsuperscript{159} Given those facts, the court held that the plaintiff’s complaint survived the chiropractor’s motion to dismiss.\textsuperscript{160}

A similarly structured inquiry could be applied in cases alleging sexual misconduct by clergy where the cleric has not held himself out as practicing secular therapeutic counseling.\textsuperscript{161} As a minimum condition for imposing liability, the inquiry should establish that the cleric has undertaken a regular course of counseling sessions with an adult congregant\textsuperscript{162} in which the cleric offers the congregant particularized advice on personal, as opposed to entirely spiritual, matters. Additionally, the congregant-plaintiff should demonstrate that the cleric knew of some special circumstance that made the congregant especially vulnerable to exploitation, such as a history of mental illness or substance abuse. Taken together, these requirements provide a safeguard against the temptation to hold clergy to a heightened standard of care because of their religious status, while simultaneously permitting courts to compensate plaintiffs who have been exploited in circumstances functionally identical to secular counseling.

\textbf{B. Civil Claims Against Religious Organizations and Supervisors}

In the preceding section, we discussed claims and charges against religious leaders accused of sexual misconduct. In this section, we examine plaintiffs’ claims against religious organizations arising out of the sexual misconduct of their clergy.\textsuperscript{163} For plaintiffs, assertions of

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{159} Id. at 349. The court cites a Nevada case, Hoopes v. Hammargren, 725 P.2d 238 (Nev. 1986), on the question of the patient’s particular vulnerability to exploitation. McCracken, 717 A.2d at 352.

\textsuperscript{160} McCracken, 717 A.2d at 355.

\textsuperscript{161} Where a cleric has held himself out as offering—or offered—secular therapeutic counseling, claims of sexual misconduct against him should be treated the same as claims against any secular counselor.

\textsuperscript{162} The category of potential plaintiffs need not be restricted to members of the cleric’s congregation, or even faith, so long as the plaintiff can show she or he developed a counseling relationship with the cleric. As noted above, this category of claims only involves mentally competent adults who engaged in noncoercive sexual relationships with the cleric.

\textsuperscript{163} For purposes of simplicity, we typically refer in this section only to the liability of the organization, although plaintiffs frequently make claims against individual agents of the organizations as well.
\end{flushleft}

1832
institutional liability are important because institutional actors are often the only available source of compensation for the wrongdoing. This is especially true when the wrongdoing happened long in the past or when the wrongdoing involved criminal conduct for which the cleric is now incarcerated. Moreover, religious institutions and communities are more than just a set of pockets deeper than those of the individual clergy. The victim frequently has a substantial relationship with the religious community that the wrongdoer served and is likely to experience the sexual abuse as a betrayal of trust that the victim placed in the community and its faith.

In this section, we divide plaintiffs’ civil law claims against religious institutions into three categories. The first consists of claims that arise out of the religious organization’s direct interactions with the plaintiff, including allegations that the organization breached obligations toward the plaintiff when responding to the plaintiff’s injury. The widely cited decision of the Supreme Court of Colorado in Moses v. Diocese of Denver\(^\text{164}\) is a good example of an alleged breach of the institutional fiduciary’s duty of loyalty, raised by a victim of sexual misconduct against a church official who had supervisory authority over the wrongdoer.

The second encompasses claims arising out of the organization’s actions taken with respect to the wrongdoer—including training, hiring, and supervising—who is alleged to have caused harm to the plaintiff. The recent decision of a Massachusetts trial court in Hogan v. Archbishop of Boston\(^\text{165}\), which led to the $85 million settlement of claims brought by several hundred plaintiffs, provides a typical list of alleged breaches of duties of care. The plaintiffs claimed that the Archbishop and his agents acted negligently with respect to the ordination, assignment, selection, supervision, transfer, and retention of the church’s priests.\(^\text{166}\)

The third category consists of claims that courts should hold a religious organization vicariously liable for the sexual misconduct of its employee. These claims do not involve allegations of wrongful conduct on the part of the institution but rather impute to the \(^{166}\) The court distinguished plaintiffs’ negligent retention, selection, and transfer claims from negligent ordination and failure to laicize—that is, to strip priests’ ordination. Id. It held the latter claims barred by the Constitution.

\(^{164}\) 863 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1993).

wrongdoer’s employer the responsibility for bearing the costs of its employee’s misdeeds.

These three categories of institutional liability—as a fiduciary to victims, as a negligent actor in the supervision of clergy, and, by way of the doctrine of respondeat superior, as an employer of clergy—have all been expanding in response to the scandals associated with clergy sexual misconduct. Some aspects of this expansion are constitutionally acceptable and meritorious on policy grounds. Other features of these developments, however, are dubious on both constitutional and policy grounds. In what follows, we look in depth at each of the three categories. Fiduciary liabilities are growing the quickest and pose the greatest risk of unconstitutionally singling out religious institutions for disfavored treatment. Negligence liabilities are a matter of great controversy, and we offer what we hope is the novel and useful suggestion that First Amendment standards, borrowed from the constitutional law of defamation, may help reconcile the tensions in this field. Vicarious liability has shown the least tendency to expand under pressure, but here, too, we identify considerations of constitutionality and policy that may help courts move in a sound direction.

1. Institutional fiduciary duties to victims of sexual misconduct

In Part IV.A, above, we discussed claims against sexual wrongdoers and noted the persistent trend among courts to reject claims of clergy malpractice while remaining receptive to claims that clergy had breached fiduciary duties to their parishioner-counselees. It was only with more caution than courts have exercised that we approved of this move, which rests on the constitutional presupposition that the state may not define duties of pastoral care but may specify duties of pastoral-counselor loyalty.

When the locus of liability shifts from clergy wrongdoers to institutional actors who stand behind them, the constitutional norms may play out in more subtle ways, but the underlying dynamics remain the same. Here, too, courts must craft legally imposed duties in constitutionally sensitive ways. Tort law rules and processes should not permit religious character alone to trigger the imposition of duties, nor should tort law effectively require religious entities to restructure themselves to satisfy a state-imposed vision of the “good” or well-ordered religion.
In a number of recent suits, plaintiffs have diversified their claims against organizations in much the same ways that they and their lawyers have learned to do against individual wrongdoers.\textsuperscript{167} It has become routine for such lawsuits to include claims that the defendant institutions or supervisors have breached fiduciary duties, as well as duties of care, to plaintiffs who assert that they have been victims of sexual abuse. In the context of institutional claims, however, fiduciary responsibilities have a very different character than in the context of claims against clergy alleged to be sexual wrongdoers. In the latter context, the assertion always involves an intimate relationship between the clergyman and the parishioner.\textsuperscript{168} In contrast, the institutional fiduciary claims rarely involve any close, personal connection between organizational leaders and victims of sexual abuse. Instead, the claim of fiduciary breach in such cases typically arises out of the organization’s failure to investigate allegations of wrong,\textsuperscript{169} to warn potential victims,\textsuperscript{170} to take earlier remedial action against known wrongdoers, or a combination of such defaults.\textsuperscript{171}

The law of fiduciary duties requires a demonstration that a relation of trust and confidence exists between the parties—that the claimed beneficiary of the duty has reposed special confidence in the claimed holder of the duty and that the asserted holder of the duty has accepted that trust.\textsuperscript{172} In such a relationship, the trusted party is under a legal duty to act for, and give advice for the benefit of, the trusting party on matters within the scope of their relationship.\textsuperscript{173} A number of courts have dismissed on the pleadings such claims against religious institutions on the theory that the defendant religious organization and its representatives have not undertaken any special duties with respect to each and every adherent of the \textsuperscript{168} See, e.g., Destefano v. Grabrian, 763 P.2d 275 (Colo. 1988).

\textsuperscript{167} The leading decisions marking this trend include Martinelli v. Bridgeport Roman Catholic Diocese Corp., 196 F.3d 409 (2nd Cir. 1999) and Moses v. Diocese of Colo., 863 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1993). Both of these decisions are analyzed in detail below.

\textsuperscript{169} See, e.g., Martinelli, 196 F.3d at 426–30.

\textsuperscript{170} Bryan R. v. Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc’y, 738 A.2d 839 (Me. 1999).

\textsuperscript{171} Doe v. Evans, 814 So. 2d 370, 372 (Fla. 2002).

\textsuperscript{172} See supra notes 136–37 and accompanying text (defining elements of the fiduciary relation).

\textsuperscript{173} RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 874 cmt. a (1979).
These dismissals are consistent with a common-sense recognition, rarely expressed in judicial opinions, that religious institutions have their own set of interests, some religious and some material, which may conflict with the interests of individuals. Accordingly, members of the religious community do not have any legitimate expectations that organizations will respond to assertions of sexual misconduct by clergy with actions taken for the sole benefit of the accuser.

Nevertheless, perhaps out of understandable impulses that wrongs should be remedied and that religious organizations, claiming to do God’s work, should be held to standards higher than those of the marketplace, some prominent courts have begun to expand the fiduciary obligations of religious organizations and their spokespersons in cases involving sexual abuse. The first important opinion in this line of development is Moses v. Diocese of Colorado, 175 decided by the Colorado Supreme Court in 1993. Ms. Moses (now known as Mary Moses Tenantry and so referenced in the opinion), who had been sexually abused by her father and had a long history of mental illness, became sexually involved with a Episcopal priest, Father Robinson, at her church. 176 Ms. Tenantry had sought the priest out for counseling on family matters, although the opinion hints that her infatuation with him began prior to the counseling. 177 When her husband learned of the affair, he consulted with the diocesan bishop, who asserted his desire to supervise “whatever needed to happen.” 178 In the presence of Ms. Tenantry’s husband, the bishop confronted Father Robinson, who by this time had become pastor of a different church, and urged him to get counseling and to advise the bishop immediately if there were any similar episodes in his new parish. 179

The bishop then met with Ms. Tenantry and advised her to stay away from Father Robinson. 180 He further advised her to stop talking

---

175. 863 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1993).
176. Id. at 316.
177. Id.
178. Id. at 317.
179. Id.
180. Id. at 318.
about her affair to anyone except her husband and a “priest or counselor.” According to the opinion, the bishop “took no further action to assist [Ms.] Tenantry after this meeting.”

Three years later, Ms. Tenantry had a chance encounter with Father Robinson. Her report of the encounter to her husband began a downward spiral that led to the dissolution of her marriage, disintegration of other family relations, failure of her business, and profound collapse of her mental health. At trial, mental health experts testified that the bishop’s willingness to support Father Robinson in his assignment at his new parish “led to the unraveling of Ms. Tenantry’s personality structure.” More particularly, these experts testified that her personality structure depended upon her relationship with the church, in which she had lost confidence as a result of her experience with Father Robinson and the bishop. The bishop’s actions, according to this testimony, aggravated her breakdown in trust because the bishop:

1) allowed her to believe that she was primarily at fault; 2) did not ask to hear her side of the affair; 3) did not ask her how she felt about the relationship or how she planned to deal with it; and 4) requested that she maintain secrecy about the relationship.

The Colorado Supreme Court affirmed a judgment for Ms. Tenantry against the bishop and the diocese. Asserting the quite familiar distinction between clergy malpractice and fiduciary duties, the court ruled that the jury had been properly instructed on the elements of fiduciary duty and that there had been sufficient evidence to support the verdict. As the court characterized the claim, “this case involves a party who used his superior position as a counselor, a bishop, and a final arbiter of problems with the clergy to the detriment of a vulnerable, dependent party.”

181. Id.
182. Id. at 318.
183. Id.
184. Id.
185. Id.
186. Id. at 318 n.9.
187. The Colorado Supreme Court had already pioneered the distinction in Destefano, discussed and criticized in Part III.A.
188. Moses, 863 P.2d at 337.
189. Id. at 322.
The Moses opinion is full of danger signs for religious organizations. It is not hard to see the ways in which Ms. Tenantry’s troubled past would lead the courts, and jurors, to be sympathetic to her plight. But it is equally easy to see, if one is willing to look, that the bishop did not hold himself out as her counselor, nor did he represent that he was acting in her interest rather than the institutional interests of the church in clergy management and crisis control. The expert’s testimony that the bishop did not listen to Ms. Tenantry’s side of the story or help her explore her feelings or her planned course of action, is quite inconsistent with a claim that he was acting as her spiritual counselor rather than the caretaker of the church’s interests. When courts allow juries, under vague and general instructions, to permit the institutional position of bishop or pastoral leader to become dispositive factors in the imposition of fiduciary duties, courts are effectively imposing upon religious organizations a state-backed vision of how religious organizations should conduct pastoral relations. As understandable as those normative expectations may be, their application to religious organizations in cases like Moses is in serious tension with the First Amendment considerations associated with the doctrines of ecclesiastical immunity.190

The constitutional defects lurking in the Moses decision manifested themselves two years later in Winkler v. Rocky Mountain Conference,191 decided by a Colorado appellate court. Winkler, a church volunteer, alleged that her pastor had groped her and other women.192 Consequently, she sued the pastor, the congregation, and the United Methodist Conference to which the congregation belonged, alleging, among other things, breach of fiduciary duty.193 The local congregation settled with the plaintiff, but the plaintiff received a substantial jury award in her fiduciary duty claim against the conference.194 In contrast to Moses, Winkler’s claims do not arise out of the direct counseling relationship between conference officials and herself. Instead, the alleged fiduciary relationship is based

190. If Father Robinson exploited another counselee at his new parish and the bishop had failed to warn officers at that parish of Father Robinson’s prior problems, potential liability to the next victims would rest on theories of negligence we explore in Part IV, below, rather than a theory of fiduciary duty.
192. Id. at 156.
193. Id.
194. Id. at 157.
entirely on actions taken by the conference in investigating her charges:

Winkler asserts that a fiduciary relationship was created by the Conference assuming control of the investigation of her complaints and those of others. Winkler argues that such a fiduciary relationship was created by: (1) the Conference's actions at the April 24, 1992, meeting at which the Conference seemed very concerned about the women and wanted them to stay together and be supportive of each other; (2) the Conference providing a therapist to help the women; and (3) the Conference preparing and sending a letter to the Grace Church congregation stating that: “We are equally concerned for the healing of any persons who have been hurt. They will continue to receive appropriate help for their healing and restoration.”

Winkler then alleged that the conference breached its fiduciary duties by not providing the victims with adequate support, which included the conference’s failure to inform the congregation “that it had found the women’s claim credible.” Although the conference’s act of providing counseling may look like a traditional fiduciary’s undertaking, Winkler did not allege any breach arising out of the quality of that counseling. The breach seems to involve only the quality of the conference’s administrative response to the cleric’s wrongdoing. Nonetheless, the court sustained the jury’s finding that the conference owed, and had breached, fiduciary duties to Ms. Winkler.

Four years later, judicial willingness to permit claims of fiduciary duty against organizations expanded yet further in a highly influential decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Martinelli v. Bridgeport Roman Catholic Diocesan Corp. 196 F.3d 409 (2d Cir. 1999). Martinelli involved allegations that a diocese had failed in the mid-1960s to investigate complaints about Father Lawrence Brett, who had been a parish priest in Stamford, Connecticut, and then spiritual

---

195. Id. at 158.
196. Id.
197. Id. The conference did not directly provide the women with counseling; instead, it financed counseling of the women provided by professionals. Id.
198. Id.
199. Id.
200. 196 F.3d 409 (2d Cir. 1999).
director at a Catholic college within the diocese. Father Brett had initiated a sexual relationship with Mr. Martinelli at a time when Brett “acted as a mentor and spiritual advisor to a small group of boys, including Martinelli, who were interested in liturgical reforms in the Catholic Church.” Martinelli alleged that he recovered his memory of this experience in the early 1990s, and complained in his lawsuit that the diocese had not pursued the complaints about Father Brett that it received from others in the mid-1960s. Had the diocese done so, Martinelli claimed, it would have discovered that Father Brett abused him, and it would have helped Martinelli to seek the sort of assistance that might have prevented the emotional harm that befell him as his life proceeded.

The fiduciary claim in Martinelli played a central role in the disposition of the case because of the statute of limitations. If Martinelli’s claim sounded only in negligence, the claim would have been time-barred. If, however, the claim of fiduciary obligation and breach was legally sufficient, tolling doctrines of fraudulent concealment (applicable to those with fiduciary obligations) would come into play and open up the possibility of recovery on the merits.

Under the pressure of this problem, the Second Circuit ruled that the diocese owed fiduciary obligations to Martinelli. The diocese argued that it could not be held to have a special relationship of trust and confidence with each and every one of the 300,000 Roman Catholics in the Bridgeport Diocese. The court rejected, however, this conception of the diocese’s fiduciary duty. The complaints that had come to the diocese in 1966 included one from a young man who had been a member of the small group of boys with whom Father Brett had cultivated close relationships. Accordingly, the court reasoned, the diocese had a duty to the other students in that small group to investigate further, to locate other victims if there

201. Id. at 414–15.
202. Id. at 414.
203. Id. at 416.
204. Id. at 426.
205. Id. at 416.
206. Id.
207. Id. at 428–29.
208. Id.
209. Id. at 430.
were any, and to help such victims cope with the emotional injury inflicted by their experience with Father Brett.

Like Moses, the opinion in Martinelli proceeds from understandable impulses. Martinelli suffered emotionally from Father Brett’s encounters with him, and the diocese did nothing to search out other, unknown victims of Father Brett’s sexual misconduct. But here, as in Moses, the imposition of fiduciary duties upon the diocese to a young man whose identity was unknown involves assertions of a relationship of personal trust and confidence that the diocese had not undertaken. That parishioners hope and expect that religious officials will respond to allegations of wrongdoing in a proactive, victim-oriented way cannot in and of itself create a relationship in which the religious organization is legally obliged to do so. To hold otherwise is to make parishioners’, judges’, and juries’ collective expectations for religious organizations the measure of organizational liability. And that measure, imposed by the expectations of third parties rather than by explicit undertakings of the faith community, will inevitably result in pressure to internalize state-imposed changes in organizational structure. Whatever it is labeled, this kind of liability represents a normative judgment about organizational (mal)practice—that is, a judgment about how the religious polity responds in crisis to its clergy and to its adherents.

For church lawyers looking for ways to confine Martinelli, the fact that Mr. Martinelli was a member of a small group of followers of Father Brett, and that the diocese had learned that Father Brett had abused another boy in that group, represents the case’s dominant and potentially limiting feature. But in Doe v. Evans, the Florida Supreme Court has recently expanded the most disturbing feature of Martinelli—that an institution can assume fiduciary duties to an unknown member—in a way that must have sent chills up church lawyers’ spines. Doe significantly furthers the trend toward recognizing organizational fiduciary duties in cases in which there is no personal, face-to-face relationship between the organization and the claimed beneficiary.

---

210. Id.
211. Mark Chopko characterizes this sort of liability as “situational.” See Chopko, supra note 67, at 1106–07.
212. 814 So. 2d 370 (Fla. 2002).
Ms. Doe, an adult at all relevant times, alleged that she belonged to the Church of the Holy Redeemer, an Episcopal Church in the Diocese of South Florida; that Pastor Evans offered her pastoral marital counseling when he learned that she was having marital difficulties; and that he commenced a personal and romantic relationship with her. This relationship caused Ms. Doe harm, and the diocese and its officers knew that Evans had engaged in sexual misconduct during counseling at this and other churches within the diocese. Doe also alleged that the diocese “had the right to exercise control over a sexually exploitive pastoral counselor” and failed to do so. She asserted that the diocese’s actions constituted negligent hiring, negligent supervision, and a breach of fiduciary duty. The lower court dismissed these claims on First Amendment grounds, and an intermediate appellate court affirmed.

The Florida Supreme Court reversed and reinstated all of Ms. Doe’s claims. Having analyzed comparable negligence problems in a very recent companion case, Malicki v. Doe, the court said virtually nothing new in Evans about issues of negligent supervision but simply reiterated that such claims involved “neutral principles” of law and therefore were not subject to any First Amendment bar. With respect to the fiduciary duty claim, the court was brief and blunt. Citing the Second Circuit’s opinion in Martinelli, the opinion announced:

[When a church, through its clergy, holds itself out as qualified to engage in marital counseling and a counseling relationship arises, that relationship between the church and the counselee is one that may be characterized as fiduciary in nature. . . . [A]s to the

---

213. Id. at 371–73. The complaint does not allege a sexual relationship, although the parties briefed the case, and the court decided it, on the assumption that the relationship was sexual. One of the dissenting judges rested his objections to the opinion on the ground that the court had impermissibly gone outside the pleadings in making this assumption. Id. at 379–81 (Wells, C.J., dissenting).

214. Id. at 372.

215. Id. (internal quotation omitted).

216. Id.

218. 814 So. 2d 347 (Fla. 2002).

219. Evans, 814 So. 2d at 373 (citing Malicki, 814 So. 2d at 361).

220. Id. at 375 (citing Martinelli, 196 F.3d at 430). The court also cited the Colorado Supreme Court’s opinion in Destefano v. Grabrian, 763 P.2d 275, 284 (Colo. 1988). Evans, 814 So. 2d at 374.
relationship[] between Doe and . . . the Church Defendants, it is a question for the jury to determine whether a fiduciary relationship arose; the nature of that relationship; and whether as a result of the Church Defendants’ conduct, there was a breach of the Church Defendants’ duty as fiduciaries to Doe.221

The opinion at this point drew no distinction between the Church of the Holy Redeemer, which employed Pastor Evans, and the Episcopal Diocese of South Florida, which stood somewhere in the background of that employment relationship but was not a party to it.

By failing to distinguish between personal and institutional relationships with the plaintiff, Doe v. Evans completed the cycle of expansion of institutional fiduciary duties. Unlike claims against the sexual wrongdoer, in which fiduciary duties arise out of the personal undertaking as counselor, such duties arise in Doe v. Evans out of wholly impersonal relations between the church and its members. The duty springs from the general church’s holding out its pastors as willing to counsel its adherents, coupled with general knowledge of a pastor’s tendencies to exploit such relationships in the past. Under legally apt circumstances of control, discussed below,222 we can understand and might well approve the imposition of duties to supervise the conduct of Pastor Evans, although they fall more readily and efficiently on his employer, the Church of the Holy Redeemer, than on the far more remote Episcopal Diocese of South Florida. Failure to supervise, by one with knowledge of danger and in a position to supervise, may appropriately give rise to liability in negligence.

The court holding in Doe v. Evans, however, goes considerably further. It is unmindful of degrees of care and supervision that the church and the diocese might have imposed on Pastor Evans, and it is similarly heedless of questions of diocesan control, or lack thereof, over the hiring and work of pastors. The decision effectively instructs such a religious organization that it acts at its peril if it fails to remove from any pastoral role all clergy that it has reason to know have tendencies like those Evans allegedly possessed.

Religious polities and personnel policies of the sort dictated by Doe v. Evans may well be prudent and humane. To those untutored 221. Id. at 375 (emphasis added).

in the complex structure of religious organizations and the pastoral quality of their personnel arrangements, the Florida Supreme Court’s expectations of how such organizations should behave will seem entirely reasonable. And juries, which must apply this new, sweeping conception of fiduciary duty, are likely to share those expectations, especially in a world flooded with stories about pedophile priests and lustful clerics of every religious persuasion.

Nevertheless, we believe that the trend represented by the decisions from Moses to Evans creates three distinct problems. First, a rule that declares the mere meeting between a religious leader and a victim to be a trigger of a fiduciary duty may create disincentives to ameliorative contacts within the religious community. Whatever mixture of institutional interests and victim-supportive concerns may produce such interactions, they have the potential to accomplish some good. A victim of sexual abuse by clergy might seek out a religious leader about coping with anger or depression, or for guidance with the task of forgiveness, or for action in the form of clergy discipline. Such contacts may be deeply salutary. If institutions, in doing more than they must, create a risk of liability for doing less than they might, such ameliorative efforts might decrease in frequency.

Second, this line of decisions finds no counterpart among secular institutions and therefore raises a question of discrimination against religious organizations in application of the law. Perhaps courts would apply comparable fiduciary standards to secular entities in an appropriate case, but this saving possibility has not yet arisen. Moreover, we have reason to doubt that courts would do so, especially in circumstances where the relationship is as remote as that between the diocese and the plaintiff in Doe v. Evans. Courts could, of course, take steps toward solving this problem by making clear that such theories of fiduciary duty apply equally to both religious and secular organizations. But even if courts did so clarify, jury instructions should be carefully framed so as to warn against relying on an institution’s religious character alone as a source of legal duty.

Third, as we emphasize throughout this paper, the Establishment Clause forbids a state from using the civil law to impose a normative vision of the structure of religious organizations. Such organizations face complex tasks, material and spiritual. They have responsibilities to their adherents, but they also maintain relationships with their financial supporters, with those dependent on the organization’s largesse, and with other organizations in their community. Most importantly, religious institutions generally aspire to act with fidelity toward their tradition. Like many secular nonprofit organizations, religious institutions operate through a variety of agents, both employees and volunteers. Without question, they should be aware of the risks of harm to third parties which their activities may create, and they should take reasonable precautions—within the boundaries of their own self-determined structures—to avoid the harms such risks entail. Encumbering them, however, with special duties of loyalty to their adherents, who may number in the many millions and be spread across the globe, inevitably involves either a rearrangement in their structure, policy, or practice of relations with clergy, or, if they are unwilling to so rearrange under the pressures of tort law, a system of fines upon them for continuing to rely on structures of authority inadequate to control clergy who misbehave.

---

After Doe, one would expect the Episcopal Diocese of South Florida, and other comparable religious entities, to significantly increase their degree of control over the decisions of individual Episcopal churches to hire or retain particular priests. Because such duties of loyalty to all adherents of the faith effectively dictate the mechanisms of control over clergy, and effectively compel a particular organizational response to victims of clergy misbehavior, imposing these duties tends to unconstitutionally establish a legally preferred structure of denominational life.

2. Institutional duties of care in employment of clergy

Most of the cases brought against religious organizations assert that such institutions are obliged to act with reasonable care in their employment practices, especially when their employees will have significant interaction with children or other vulnerable people. We can divide plaintiffs’ claims of institutional negligence into two general categories. The first consists of charges that the defendant negligently conferred religious status on the wrongdoer; this theory raises obvious constitutional problems, which we discuss below. The second includes claims that the defendant negligently employed the wrongdoer. This theory suggests more subtle constitutional concerns, which we elaborate at greater length.
Negligent ordination. Claims in this category are the most constitutionally problematic, and accordingly are the least commonly raised by plaintiffs. Four different kinds of alleged negligence fall within this heading: (1) the religious entity should have done a better job of screening candidates for the ministry to eliminate those with a propensity for sexual misconduct;224 (2) the entity should have trained candidates for the ministry in how to avoid or prevent sexual misconduct;225 (3) the entity should not have ordained (or licensed or certified) a particular candidate for ministry;226 or (4) (which we discuss in the next section) the entity should have revoked the wrongdoer’s religious status.227

As far as we can tell, no court has permitted a plaintiff to proceed on a claim that an institution negligently prepared or ordained a candidate for ministry.228 The constitutional defects with such an inquiry are all too obvious. The choice and application of criteria for ordained ministry involve quintessentially religious questions.229 On two occasions, the U.S. Supreme Court has held that courts cannot exercise jurisdiction over the eligibility of candidates for ecclesiastical office.230 The ministerial exception to employment laws has a similar

228. The closest case may be Harkins v. Gauthie, 707 So. 2d 1308 (La. Ct. App. 1998), in which a priest employed by the diocese sexually molested a boy at a motocross event. The court held that “[i]t is proper to have a duty of care in situations where the church could be the basis of the diocese’s duty to a Catholic child, even though the child did not plead that he was a member of a congregation within that diocese. Id. at 1313–14.

229. “Whether an individual is qualified to be a clergy member of a particular faith is a matter to be determined by the procedures and dictates of that particular faith.” Rashedi, 54 P.3d at 352 (citations omitted); see Chopko, supra note 67, at 1112–13.

function—it strictly limits the ability of courts to intervene in disputes about the qualification or employment status of clergy.\textsuperscript{231}

Claims about the screening or training of candidates for status as clergy may seem, at first glance, to be less objectionable than those focused on the decision to ordain or license a candidate. After all, seminaries and theological schools often have to comply with standards for accreditation, which tend to have far more robust requirements than those proposed by plaintiffs.\textsuperscript{232} Accreditation, however, is voluntary. Organizations may choose to require their leaders to obtain certain credentials, but the government does not, and may not, mandate any qualifications for ordained ministry. Indeed, hostility to government licensing of clergy is an important part of the historical legacy of the Constitution’s religion clauses.\textsuperscript{233}

Finally, a duty of “reasonably careful ordination” would place a greater burden on religious organizations than is imposed on nonreligious bodies and, therefore, would violate the constitutional norm against disfavoring religious entities. Neither professional schools nor professional associations in law, medicine, or other learned disciplines can be held liable for negligent preparation for or admission to professional status. Because other, more constitutionally sensitive and precisely focused theories of relief can address the harms about which the state has a legitimate concern, like protecting the vulnerable from foreseeable harm, courts should continue to reject claims of negligent preparation for ministry.

b. Negligent employment. Plaintiffs’ most common claims of institutional negligence focus on the defendant’s employment relationship with the wrongdoer. The claims allege that the defendant failed to exercise due care in one or more facets of that relationship, whether in hiring, supervising, or failing to discharge the wrongdoer. In contrast to claims of negligent ordination, the concept of negligent employment practices has clear and well established secular parallels. Section 307 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts provides: “It is negligence to use an instrumentality, whether a human being or a thing, which the actor knows or should know to be so incompetent, inappropriate, or defective, that its use involves an unreasonable risk of harm to others.” Section 317 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts extends that liability to acts that fall outside the scope of the agent’s employment:

\textsuperscript{231} See supra notes 69–95 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{232} See, for example, the accreditation standards of the Association of Theological Schools in the United States and Canada, available at http://www.ats.edu/accredit/standoc.htm.

A master is under a duty to exercise reasonable care so to control his servant while acting outside the scope of his employment as to prevent him from intentionally harming others or from so conducting himself as to create an unreasonable risk of bodily harm to them, if

(a) the servant
   (i) is upon the premises in possession of the master or upon which the servant is privileged to enter only as his servant, or
   (ii) is using a chattel of the master, and

(b) the master
   (i) knows or has reason to know that he has the ability to control his servant, and
   (ii) knows or should know of the necessity and opportunity for exercising such control.235

---

234. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 307 (1965); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 213 (1958) (“A person conducting an activity through servants or other agents is subject to liability for harm resulting from his conduct if he is negligent or reckless: . . . (b) in the employment of improper persons or instrumentalities in work involving risk of harm to others.”). In the context of clergy sex abuse, plaintiffs’ claims of negligent hiring involve defects in the decision to place a candidate in a specific position, or defects in the process of selection—that is, the employer should have done a more thorough investigation or screening of candidates. See, e.g., Nutt v. Norwich Roman Catholic Diocese, 56 F. Supp. 2d 195, 200–01 (D. Conn. 1999); Roman Catholic Bishop of S.D. v. Superior Court, 50 Cal. Rptr. 2d 399, 402–06 (Cal. Ct. App. 1996); Evan F. v. Hughson United Methodist Church, 10 Cal. Rptr. 2d 748, 757–58 (Cal. Ct. App. 1992); Moses v. Diocese of Colo., 863 P.2d 310, 323–29 (Co. 1993); Pelto v. Fuleki, 10 Conn. L. Rptr. 254 (Conn. Super. Ct. 1993); Malicki v. Doe, 814 So. 2d 589, 593–94 (Fla. 2002); J.M. v. Minn. Dist. Council of the Assemblies of God, 658 N.W.2d 589, 593–94 (Minn. Ct. App. 2003); Jones v. Trane, 591 N.Y.S.2d 927, 931–32 (Sup. Ct. 1992); Podolinski v. Episcopal Diocese of Pittsburgh, 23 Pa. D. & C.4th 385, 401–04 (Pa. Com. Pl. 1995).

235. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 317 (1965). Section 317 is important because so few courts have found sexual misconduct, especially involving children, to be within the scope of the cleric’s employment. See also Konkle v. Henson, 672 N.E.2d 450, 454–55

1848
The comment to Section 317 addresses liability for negligent retention:

There may be circumstances in which the only effective control which the master can exercise over the conduct of his servant is to discharge the servant. Therefore the master may subject himself to liability under the rule stated in this Section by retaining in his employment servants who, to his knowledge, are in the habit of misconducting themselves in a manner dangerous to others.236

Despite widespread recognition of the tort of negligent employment in cases against secular employers, courts and commentators have disagreed sharply on the constitutionality of applying the tort to religious institutions’ employment of clerics and other leaders.237 In some jurisdictions, courts have held that the First Amendment confers on religious institutions complete immunity from claims of negligent employment,238 while courts in other jurisdictions have held that the First Amendment provides no such immunity.239 Indeed, at least one court has gone so far as to say that the Establishment Clause may actually prohibit a grant of immunity in this context.240 As we argue below, these two categorical approaches are inadequate, in terms of both the constitutional values and the public policies at stake in adjudicating negligent employment claims against religious organizations. After examining and rejecting the two categorical models, we offer a more nuanced way to accommodate the relevant constitutional and policy concerns.

236. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 317 cmt. c.

237. Other scholarly attempts to discuss these questions include Carmella, supra note 103, at 1054–55; Chopko, supra note 67, at 1112–13; Christopher R. Farrell, Note, Ecclesiastical Abstention and the Crisis in the Catholic Church, 19 J. L. & Pol. 109 (2003); and Mansfield, supra note 62, at 1169.

238. See, e.g., Bryan R. v. Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc’y, 738 A.2d 839 (Me. 1999); Swanson v. Roman Catholic Bishop of Portland, 692 A.2d 441 (Me. 1997); L.L.N. v. Clauer, 563 N.W.2d 434 (Wis. 1997); Pritzlaff v. Archdiocese of Milwaukee, 533 N.W.2d 780 (Wis. 1995).

(1) Categorical approaches. When faced with claims that a religious institution has failed to exercise due care in the employment of a religious leader, courts tend to proceed on an all-or-nothing basis. These courts hold that either the First Amendment imposes no limitation on applying traditional tort standards, or the First Amendment stands as a complete bar to the application of those standards.

(a) No immunity. The first approach rests on the premise that religious employers deserve no different treatment than secular employers for their tortious employment practices. On this view, the First Amendment offers religious institutions no shield against claims of negligent hiring, supervision, and retention, especially when those claims are raised in the context of clergy sexual misconduct. Many courts that have adopted this “no immunity” approach quote from language in an opinion by Justice William Rehnquist, in which he denied a stay in a case involving a religious nursing home:

There are constitutional limitations on the extent to which a civil court may inquire into and determine matters of ecclesiastical cognizance and polity in adjudicating intrachurch disputes. But this Court never has suggested that those constraints similarly apply outside the context of such intraorganization disputes. . . . [Some] cases are premised on a perceived danger that in resolving intrachurch disputes the State will become entangled in essentially religious controversies or intervene on behalf of groups espousing particular doctrinal beliefs. Such considerations are not applicable to purely secular disputes between third parties and a particular defendant, albeit a religious affiliated organization, in which fraud, breach of contract, and statutory violations are alleged.241

Courts that adopt this stance draw a sharp distinction between internal and external disputes, and restrict the doctrine of ecclesiastical immunity to disputes that are internal, such as fights between groups within a church over control of church property. Tort claims fall squarely outside that limit. A dispute involving those

Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

“who allege that they were seriously injured by the negligence of the church officials . . . hardly can be characterized as a dispute involving an internal church matter.”

Moreover, courts that reject ecclesiastical immunity typically find that the tort of negligent employment rests upon a “neutral principle[] of law,” applicable to religious institutions even if the dispute involves questions of religious documents or practices. These courts’ use of the “neutral principles” approach, approved by the Supreme Court in cases involving disputes over religious property, is reducible to this basic proposition: “The court is simply applying secular standards to secular conduct which is permissible under First Amendment standards.” “Secular standards” refers to the principles of tort law that define an employer’s liability for negligently hiring, supervising, or retaining an employee. The reference to “secular conduct” reflects these courts’ tendency to analyze defendants’ constitutional arguments under the Free Exercise Clause. Because defendants rarely claim that the wrongdoer’s misconduct was religiously motivated, courts find that the religious institution’s response to that misconduct is not religious either, and so judicial inquiry does not implicate defendants’ First Amendment rights.

244. Jones v. Wolf, 443 U.S. 595, 603–04 (1979); see also infra notes 304–26 and accompanying text for further discussion of “neutral principles” in clergy sex abuse cases.

246. See supra notes 234–36 and accompanying text.

Enderle v. Trautman provides a good example of the “no immunity” approach. In Enderle, an adult parishioner alleged that she was injured through her adulterous sexual relationship with her pastor. In addition to claims that the pastor had breached his fiduciary duty to her, the plaintiff alleged that the congregation and synod had negligently supervised and retained the pastor. The court denied the summary judgment motions of the congregation and the synod, holding that the “determination of whether the defendants negligently supervised or retained Trautman can be made solely in accordance with well-established tort law principles.” The court continued: “[A] determination of whether Olivet and the Synod knew of Trautman’s alleged sexual improprieties and failed to respond adequately to allegations of sexual improprieties would not implicate any interpretation of ecclesiastical principles or doctrine.” These two findings, knowledge and failure to act on that knowledge, represent the core of the “no immunity” approach. The resolution of negligent employment claims in the context of sexual misconduct suits involves only the application of “secular standards” to “secular conduct.”

The problem with the Enderle court’s analysis became evident immediately after the court declared that proof of defendants’ negligence “would not implicate” matters of religious doctrine. In its summary judgment motion, the synod denied that it had “the authority to supervise or fire Trautman.” The court responded:

The Synod contends that any negligent supervision/retention claim is predicated upon an employer-employee relationship and since it did not employ Trautman it cannot be responsible for his acts. The Court agrees that an employer-employee relationship is necessary for a finding of supervisory and retention liability. However, whether Trautman was an employee of the Synod is a question of fact properly resolved by a jury.

249. Id. at *1.
250. Id. at *2.
251. Id. at *9.
252. Id. at *10.
253. Id. at *9.
254. Id.
255. Id. (citation omitted).
This “simple” question of fact goes to the proper relationship between bishops and pastors, a profoundly contested question of ecclesiastical polity.256 And yet the “no immunity” approach treats proof of this relationship as no more important than any other disputed fact in the litigation.

Is such treatment constitutionally appropriate? Or might there be some constitutional limitation on adjudication of negligent employment claims against religious organizations, a limitation that derives from the same principle that has led courts to reject claims for clergy malpractice? Above we noted that courts have uniformly denied plaintiffs’ attempts to state a cause of action for clergy malpractice.257 Any such action requires the court to articulate a standard of the reasonable cleric. Whether the standard is denomination-neutral, identifying the “reasonable religious professional,” or denomination-specific, identifying (for example) the “reasonable Greek Orthodox priest,” the problem remains the same: the plaintiff will have to put on evidence of the rules governing conduct of the religious office. If this evidence attempts to establish a generic duty of care for all ministers, the court’s adjudication will amount to the wholesale creation of not only the duty but even the categories of generic minister or generic religion, neither of which has independent reality.258 If, however, the plaintiff’s evidence seeks to establish the standard of care of a “reasonable Greek Orthodox priest,” the court will face the specter of dueling theologians, with each presenting a rival account of the priest’s office. Such a conflict would require the court to decide which of the rivals represents the authoritative interpretation of Greek Orthodox doctrine.

257. See supra notes 96–103 and accompanying text.
258. The Internal Revenue Service, of course, must distinguish religious from nonreligious actors and entities. While an assessment of IRS practice in this area is beyond the scope of this article, we think it significant that the IRS’s designation of an entity as religious does not impose normative obligations on the entity; the designation simply means that the entity enjoys a favored tax status (one that is generally, though not universally, shared with nonreligious charitable institutions). In contrast, a court’s determination of a religious professional’s standard of care would necessarily involve determination of normative obligations. The IRS criteria for designation as a religious entity was set forth in American Guidance Foundation, Inc. v. United States, 490 F. Supp. 304, 306 & n.2 (D.D.C. 1980). See also INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE, U.S. DEP’T OF TREASURY, PUB. NO. 1828, TAX GUIDE FOR CHURCHES AND RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS 23 (2002).
A similar problem confronts courts’ adjudication of negligent employment claims against religious organizations. The normative documents or standards of the religious tradition invariably govern the hiring, supervision, and retention of religious leaders. Disputes over the power to select leaders and to exercise authority over the conduct of the ministerial office manifest deep and long-standing theological differences between and within faith traditions. And yet adjudication of a negligent employment claim may result in a court imposing a specific resolution to such theological disputes. If supervisory authority is arguably located in the dioceses of a particular tradition, the court may find that the diocese acted unreasonably if it failed to exercise that authority. The operation of tort law, then, effectively requires the religious body to adopt stronger episcopal oversight, even if the extent of such oversight is strongly contested within the faith tradition.

To determine whether a court should hold a diocese liable for negligently hiring or supervising a priest, the court will need to decide that the bishop or some other agent of the diocese possessed the authority to hire, supervise, or remove that priest, and that the diocese’s agent acted carelessly in exercising that authority. Both of these determinations invite much the same inquiry as that deemed unconstitutional when applied to claims of clergy malpractice. To establish the bishop’s authority over the priest, the plaintiff must introduce evidence of such authority from canon law or from the practices of the defendant or other dioceses. To establish the allegedly unreasonable exercise of the diocese’s authority, the plaintiff must present evidence of what a reasonable person who possessed that authority would have done. The court will be obliged

259. A highly influential decision from the federal district court for the Southern District of New York makes the same point: “The traditional denominations each have their own intricate principles of governance, as to which the state has no rights of visitation. Church governance is founded in scripture, modified by reformers over almost two millenia.” Schmidt v. Bishop, 779 F. Supp. 321, 332 (S.D.N.Y. 1991).

260. In what follows, we use “diocese” and “bishop” to refer to any ecclesiastical polity with an organizational structure that includes an institution or official with responsibility over more than a single house of worship. The character of that responsibility will differ widely among, and sometimes within, religious traditions.

261. Schiltz, supra note 223, at 965–75. This concern is especially present when the issue of institutional control is a factual dispute submitted to a jury. As we note below, a jury is likely to assume that the structure of the defendant organization conforms to its expectations, i.e., the bishop of every faith has authority equivalent to that of a Roman Catholic bishop.
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

to address the question “what would a reasonable bishop have done?”

These concerns are not speculative but real. Moses v. Diocese of Colorado provides a concrete illustration of litigation that focused on expert testimony about the authority of an Episcopal bishop. The expert testified about the formal and informal authority Episcopal bishops exert within their dioceses. His evidence ranged from details about the bishop’s exercise of pastoral care for priests in the diocese, to the bishop’s relationship with seminarians preparing for ministry, to the bishop’s influence over matters not directly under control of the diocese. As in Enderle, the Moses court showed no signs of treating this evidence as constitutionally sensitive and offered the following conclusion to its recitation of the expert’s testimony: “The trial court properly submitted this issue to the jury for determination and the jury found that there was an agency relationship between Father Robinson and the Diocese.”

The Enderle and Moses decisions represent both substantive and procedural flaws in the “no immunity” approach. The substantive error resides in the courts’ treatment of ecclesiastical structure as an ordinary question of fact. The courts’ method of resolving disputes about that structure compounds this error. In both cases, the trial court sent the question to the jury.

We think that the attitudes reflected in Enderle and Moses about the role of juries, in disposing of issues of religious authority and control, are constitutionally troublesome. As is always the case in tort law, juries see the disputes in hindsight. They are aware that someone has been injured, and they are asked to assign culpability. When religious organizations are defendants, especially in sexual misconduct cases, they may well face a form of jury bias that will lead to the discriminatory imposition of special ecclesiastical liability. Jurors may have expectations, conscious or not, that religious leaders will demonstrate greater virtue than the average person. Moreover, jurors unaware of the particulars of ecclesiastical structure may assume that bishops and other religious officials have, by virtue of their office, considerably more control than they actually do.

262. 863 P.2d 310 (Colo. 1993).
263. Id. at 323–29.
264. Id.
265. Id. at 327.
A legal rule that provides religious organizations with no constitutional immunity from liability for negligent employment of clergy may thus lead, with some predictable frequency, to the imposition of undeserved liability for failure to act as a “reasonable religious organization” should. And this, in turn, will inevitably create incentives for religious organizations to reconfigure their structure of authority in ways designed to avoid liability. First Amendment norms should address the role of state law in the imposition of that incentive structure.

(b) Categorical immunity. The second approach is the complete opposite of the first and rests on the premise that any inquiry into a religious entity’s exercise of authority over its leaders unconstitutionally entangles the court with a religious community’s right of self-governance. As expressed by the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine in Swanson v. Roman Catholic Bishop of Portland,

When a civil court undertakes to compare the relationship between a religious institution and its clergy with the agency relationship of the business world, secular duties are necessarily introduced into the ecclesiastical relationship and the risk of constitutional violation is evident. The exploration of the ecclesiastical relationship is itself problematic. To determine the existence of an agency relationship based on actual authority, the trial court will most likely have to examine church doctrine governing the church’s authority over [the priest].

266. A number of courts hold that categorical immunity applies only to claims of negligent hiring and/or negligent retention—a distinction that they purport to draw from the “ministerial exception” cases. See, e.g., Isely v. Capuchin Province, 880 F. Supp. 1138, 1151–54 (E.D. Mich. 1995) (holding that the First Amendment bars claim of negligent hiring, but not negligent supervision); J.M. v. Minn. Dist. Council of Assemblies of God, 658 N.W.2d 589 (Minn. Ct. App. 2003) (holding that the First Amendment bars scrutiny of church’s hiring decision but not supervision or retention). It is not clear to us why that distinction should matter. The torts of negligent hiring, supervision, and retention all involve essentially the same questions: did the defendant have notice of the wrongdoer’s propensity to commit sexual misconduct, authority to prevent the harm, and some duty of care to those who were harmed? Seen in that light, hiring and retention are simply points along a continuum of opportunities for a principal to exercise control over its agents.

267. 692 A.2d 441 (Me. 1997).
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

Even assuming that the trial court could discern the existence of actual authority without determining questions of church doctrine or polity . . . , constitutional obstacles remain. The imposition of secular duties and liability on the church as a “principal” will infringe upon its right to determine the standards governing the relationship between the church, its bishop, and the parish priest . . . . Pastoral supervision is an ecclesiastical prerogative. 268

Courts in several other jurisdictions have followed the same path as that mapped in Swanson, recognizing a categorical prohibition on negligent employment claims against religious organizations and grounding that recognition in a robust doctrine of nonentanglement. 269

The court in Swanson determined that any judicial inquiry into the distribution of authority within or among religious institutions would require courts to construe religious texts and doctrines. 270 Drawing from the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Serbian Eastern Orthodox Diocese v. Milivojevich, 271 Swanson holds that the Constitution forbids any inquiry that depends on the interpretation of religious texts, such as canon law or a congregational charter, because such an exercise would inevitably impose on the religious organization an external, government-endorsed model of ecclesiastical governance. 272 Under this view, any set of employment standards adopted by the court usurps the religious institution’s autonomy to structure its polity in accordance with its own beliefs and practices. 273

The Swanson court’s approach, however, fails to acknowledge that, as with claims of professional negligence by clergy, claims of negligent employment may be justiciable under some circumstances.

268. Id. at 444–45.
270. Swanson, 692 A.2d at 444–45.
272. Swanson, 692 A.2d at 444.
273. Id. at 445.
Not every inquiry into the authority of a diocesan bishop will require the court to resolve disputed questions of ecclesiastical polity or invite the court to impose a normative form of parish governance.\textsuperscript{274} If courts can conduct any such inquiry without producing unconstitutional entanglement, there are sound jurisprudential and policy grounds for allowing judges to determine whether a particular case can proceed.

At the most basic level, plaintiffs often have experienced profound, lasting injuries from sexual molestation, and the religious institution frequently represents the only viable source of remedy for the harm they have suffered. Moreover, and notwithstanding our concerns about the imposition of alien structures of authority on religious organizations, the viability of civil actions against religious institutions should make such institutions and their insurers more responsive to concerns about their leaders’ abusive behaviors. By foreclosing all claims of negligent employment by religious organizations, Swanson determined that the risk of unconstitutional entanglement outweighs the benefits of both recovery to injured plaintiffs and potential reform of socially harmful practices of religious organizations. We believe that neither the Constitution nor a wise exercise of jurisprudence necessarily leads to such a stark, disappointing, and socially unpalatable result.

\textit{(2) An alternative approach.} The two categorical approaches share the singular virtue of ease of application. One rejects constitutional challenges to the use of traditional tort principles, while the other finds that the First Amendment grants complete immunity to religious organizations accused of negligence in their employment practices. Neither approach, however, manages to give a coherent account of why certain claims against religious organizations, such as clergy malpractice, should be barred, while others, such as an organ builder’s action against a congregation for breach of a contract to buy an instrument, should be allowed to proceed. From the no-immunity perspective, if “neutral principles” can be applied to determine the character of the authority that a bishop has over a priest, such principles could similarly be developed to adjudicate claims of clergy malpractice. From the no-liability perspective, if courts are constitutionally forbidden to inquire into the polity of a religious organization, how can a court determine whether those who signed a contract with an organ builder on behalf of a religious entity had the legal authority to do so?

\textsuperscript{274} See infra notes 306–28 and accompanying text (discussing the use of “neutral principles” to guide construction of religious texts).

Courts need, and the religion clauses require, an approach that falls somewhere between the categorical analyses outlined above. In the sections that follow, we sketch out several attempts to delimit judicial inquiry into the character and structure of ecclesial authority, while still permitting courts to hold institutions accountable for the harms that such institutions negligently inflict on those under their care. The problem requires reconciling state-created tort law with the demands of the First Amendment. Reconciliations of this sort have been part of the enterprise of constitutional law since the Supreme Court’s decision in *New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*275 almost forty years ago. Whether the tort is defamation,276 invasion of privacy,277 or intentional infliction of emotional distress,278 the First Amendment sometimes requires that concerns of tort law give way, at least in part, to constitutional considerations. In what follows, we draw in detail on the concerns of substance and process that characterize this methodology of reconciliation. Moreover, we expand on this methodology by revisiting *Jones v. Wolf*279 and by focusing on its character as a decision about rules of evidence. So viewed, Jones may buttress rather than undermine the argument for constitutional limits in cases alleging negligent employment of clergy.

(a) Reconciling tort law and the First Amendment: lessons from the freedom of the press. As we argued above in critiquing the decisions that reject all ecclesiastical immunities in this context, the constitutional problems here concern the interaction of process and substance. In cases of sexual abuse, the threat to First Amendment values arises from the role of juries, in applying general and sweeping standards of care to an employer’s duties to third parties. Here, as elsewhere, one must reconcile tort law and First Amendment considerations, and the respective roles of judge and juries. The Supreme Court’s decisions in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan\(^{280}\) and its progeny, Time, Inc. v. Hill\(^{281}\) and Hustler v. Falwell\(^{282}\) in which the Court harmonized potential liability of the press under state law with considerations of press freedom, offer provocative analogies from which to draw. The doctrines elaborated in these decisions (which we hereafter describe as the “regime of New York Times”) are designed to permit the press to perform its duties robustly, without inhibition borne of the fear of after-the-fact imposition of liability by hostile juries. Similarly, ecclesiastical immunity gives religious organizations “breathing space” within which to organize their own polities, select their own leaders, and preach their own creeds.\(^{283}\) The New York Times regime contains elements of substance as well as process, and we draw on both in developing our own recommendations.

(i) Substantive standards of liability.

a. Knowledge. One highly relevant and particularized way in which the regime of New York Times might inform the analysis of negligent employment involves the question of whether liability should be limited to those who have actual knowledge of a clergyman’s propensity to commit sexual misconduct, or whether courts should extend liability to those with constructive knowledge. Under the most robust versions of the constructive knowledge rule, religious entities may find themselves pressured to investigate the backgrounds of those who seek training or employment in their ranks of clergy. Failure to do so may give rise to liability for sexual misconduct that juries determine was reasonably foreseeable at a much earlier stage.

If the First Amendment forbids any system of clergy licensing, as suggested in Part II above, it might similarly prohibit a regime of liability that imposes on religious entities a duty to inquire into the \(^{280}\) 376 U.S. 254.

\(^{281}\) 385 U.S. 374.

\(^{282}\) 485 U.S. 46.

\(^{283}\) At least one court has extended the rule of New York Times to defamatory falsehoods uttered during a sermon, on the subject of divorce delivered as part of a worship service in a church. See McNair v. Worldwide Church of God, 242 Cal. Rptr. 823 (Cal. Ct. App. 1987).
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

psychological makeup of clergy aspirants, and the consequent financial incentive to exclude those whose life details and behavioral profiles suggest a propensity to sexual misconduct. Such a broad duty may well lead religious entities into a form of self-limitation, or self-censorship, that is inconsistent with the freedom protected by ecclesiastical immunity from official inquiry into the selection of religious leaders.

With respect to the question of culpable states of knowledge, the qualified privilege represented by the regime of New York Times v. Sullivan might be of particular value. That rule limits the liability of the press for defamation of public officials with respect to their official conduct to situations in which the defendant acted with “actual malice,” defined in New York Times as “knowing” falsehood or “reckless disregard” of the truth. The rationale of New York Times is that strict liability in defamation, as the common law imposed, or even a system of negligence-based liability, will lead to self-censorship, with a consequent loss to the public of a press willing to provide information about public officials and their official behavior.

In Gibson v. Brewer, the Supreme Court of Missouri adopted a closely analogous rule for adjudicating claims against religious organizations, in which the claims arise out of the organization’s employment of one who commits sexual misconduct. Gibson rejected plaintiffs’ claims of negligent employment, holding that adoption of any standard of reasonable care for that conduct “would result in an endorsement of religion, by approving one model for church hiring, ordination, and retention.” The court then distinguished claims

---

284. For discussion of this and other effects of sexual misconduct litigation on religious organizations, see Schiltz, supra note 223.

287. 952 S.W.2d 239 (Mo. 1997).

288. Id. at 247. The court reaches the same conclusion with respect to negligent supervision: "Adjudicating the reasonableness of a church's supervision of a cleric—what the church ‘should know’—requires inquiry into religious doctrine. . . . [T]his would create an excessive entanglement, inhibit religion, and result in the endorsement of one model of supervision." Id. Quite provocatively, the Gibson court also said that the clauses in Missouri’s state constitution “‘declaring that there shall be a separation of church and state are not only more explicit but more restrictive’ than the First Amendment.” Id. at 246 (quoting Paster v. Tussey, 512 S.W.2d 97, 101–02 (Mo. 1974)). The Gibson court does not address the state for “intentional failure to supervise clergy” from those of negligent employment:

A cause of action for intentional failure to supervise clergy is stated if (1) a supervisor (or supervisors) exists, (2) the supervisor (or supervisors) knew that harm was certain or substantially certain to result, (3) the supervisor (or supervisors) disregarded this known risk, (4) the supervisor’s inaction caused damage, and (5) the other requirements of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, section 317 are met. This cause of action requires a supervisor. The First Amendment does not, however, allow a court to decide issues of church government—whether or not a cleric should have a supervisor.289

The Gibson court rested its distinction between intentional failure and negligent failure to supervise squarely upon the First Amendment. Although the court made no reference to the regime of New York Times, Gibson’s twofold focus on actual, rather than constructive knowledge and actual, rather than constructive authority, parallels closely the concerns expressed in that regime.290

In the defamation context, the privilege created by New York Times protects the press as an instrument of control over the actions of government, at the potential expense of the reputation of officials. The press is free to publish unless it knows the story to be false and defamatory, or is in possession of information creating a high probability that the story is false and defamatory. In the context of clergy sexual misconduct, a requirement that plaintiffs show the defendants had actual knowledge of their employees’ propensity to commit misconduct is strongly analogous to the requirement of knowing falsehood in defamation. Both involve a highly culpable form of scienter as a basis for liability. Similarly, if agents of a religious organization have facts readily available to them that indicate a significant risk of sexual misconduct, and yet take no responsive action, their inaction might be seen as a “reckless disregard” of the likelihood of harm. When a clergyman spends “too much” time alone with adolescent boys, or flirts provocatively and excessively with attractive women in his congregation, supervisors will not be able to ignore the clergyman’s conduct. Any broader version of constructive knowledge of propensity for sexual misconduct, however, would function like liability for negligence or perhaps even like strict liability. Such liability standards, if internalized by religious entities, would require expensive and sweeping precautions about whom to train and ordain and would tend to operate as an externally imposed, though self-enforced, scheme of clergy licensing.

289. Id. at 248.
290. The Missouri Supreme Court’s approach in Gibson has been followed in at least one other jurisdiction. See Heroux v. Carpentier, No. PC 92-5807, 1998 R.I. Super. LEXIS 52 (Jan. 23, 1998); see also Ryan v. Roman Catholic Bishop of Providence, No. PC 95-6524, 2003 R.I. Super. LEXIS 104 (Aug. 26, 2003) (finding that a church could not be held accountable for behavior of which it was unaware); Williams v. United Pentecostal Church Int’l, 115 S.W.3d 612 (Tex. 2003) (holding that a church cannot be held liable when abuse was not foreseeable); Chopko, supra note 67, at 1119.

We recognize the force of various objections to the First Amendment-based analogy between liability for clergy supervision and liability for defamatory falsehoods. First, the strong version of the New York Times rule is limited to cases in which the plaintiffs are public officials or public figures who can fairly be said to have assumed some of the risk of defamatory publicity. 291 In contrast, plaintiffs in sexual misconduct cases—especially those in which the clergy misbehavior is criminal—cannot be said to have consented to such risks. The case for assumption of risk is at least somewhat more plausible in cases of adult counseling, but even there we cannot say that plaintiffs assume risks analogous to those of bad publicity assumed by public officials and public figures. We note, however, that the New York Times regime extends to “private figure” lawsuits for invasion of privacy, 292 and that courts may award punitive damages in defamation cases brought by “private figures” only upon a showing of actual malice. 293 Thus, even in situations involving private figures who have not consented to the risk of adverse publicity, the Supreme Court has remained solicitous of the interests of the press in conducting its business free of the fear of crushing and unpredictable liability.

A second, and perhaps more telling, objection to extending the “actual malice” rule to claims of negligent supervision by religious entities is the disincentive such a rule may create to investigate and respond to hints of sexual misconduct by clergy. Under the regime of New York Times, the press may have such a disincentive to more fully investigate stories that are potentially defamatory. This disincentive would arise from a fear of learning information that might make a story appear to be knowingly false or to have been published in “reckless disregard” of the truth.294

We do not dismiss this concern lightly, but we have a number of responses to it. First, the argument is overstated with respect to press liability and is even more overstated with respect to the liability of religious organizations. The incentive to avoid liability in both cases may be substantial, but the counterincentives to behave responsibly can normally be expected to produce socially productive behavior. For the press, the incentive to ignorance created by the regime of New York Times is typically offset by the concern for institutional reputation. The press earns and maintains respect by its reputation for accuracy, and by the perceived investment it makes in accuracy. Reputable news organizations that structure their news gathering so as to avoid learning facts that might make them realize that planned stories are false would soon be considered disreputable. The decline in reputation would cost them readers, listeners, viewers, and, quite quickly, advertisers as well.

We recognize that the tabloid press might face a different structure of incentives and behave differently. But we are confident that the great majority of religious organizations would follow the path of the reputable press by designing structures of information gathering designed to keep them informed about risks of harm. Indeed, we think there are good reasons to expect the great majority of religious entities to do even better than the reputable press in pursuing information relative to the risks they create. The press writes about strangers, operates on short time lines, and is in the business of selling copy. Whatever its institutional concerns about accuracy, fairness, and reputation, the press at times may lack incentive to self-correction fully sufficient to avoid the danger of defamatory falsehood.

By contrast, the question of how to manage the risk of clergy misconduct involves a very different set of institutional considerations. First, the victims of such misconduct are highly likely to be adherents, perhaps long-term, to a faith community. The care and concern frequently felt for and owed to those in a lengthy and committed association with such a community is very likely to be thicker and deeper than what is felt toward the victims of defamation, who are likely to be perceived in an impersonal manner. Second, sex scandals leave an enduring stain on the affected institutions and individuals. Short of an extended bout of plagiarism, the press is rarely exposed to the risk that its employees can quickly compromise an enormous portion of its institutional good will. Third, most leaders of religious institutions are entrusted with the stewardship of good will engendered by a legacy of hundreds or thousands of years of human faith. Such leaders have frequently committed their entire adult lives to such institutions and face consequences of condemnation and shame if they bring the faith into disrepute.

Thus, when rumors float upward in a religious organization, we expect that incentives to ameliorate the problem will frequently overcome the liability-avoiding disincentives to investigate. If we are correct in our expectations, religious organizations will systematically take steps that will bring to them actual knowledge of their clergy’s propensity to sexual misconduct. Such steps will follow inevitably from the combination of regard for adherents of the faith with a sense of immediate history. Does not every living religious leader have an acute awareness of the damage done to the Roman Catholic Church in the U.S. as a result of public perception that the Church could have stopped the epidemic of abuse within its ranks? We think that liability for knowing but not acting will quickly lead to an urge to both know and act, rather than to some contrived and willful ignorance.

Even if we are overly optimistic in our expectations, organizations that structure themselves to avoid knowledge of their agents’ misdeeds face serious risks of criminal and civil liability.295

295. For a sophisticated legal and ethical analysis of entities arranged to avoid knowledge of and responsibility for their agents’ acts, see David Luban, Contrived Ignorance, 87 GEO. L.J. 957 (1999). For recent discussions of the interplay between institutional structure, legal structure, and criminal responsibility, see Larry Alexander, Insufficient Concern: A Unified Conception of Criminal Culpability, 88 CAL. L. REV. 931 (2000); Kimberly Kessler Ferzan, Opaque Recklessness, 91 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 597 (2001); Neal Kumar Katyal, Conspiracy Theory, 112 YALE L.J. 1307 (2003); Robert Weisberg, Reappraising Complicity, 4 BUFF. CRIM. L. REV. 217 (2000).
Thus, a responsible and well-advised religious leader will not create structures of information flow designed to insulate him from knowledge that a particular clergyman presents a significant risk of sexual misconduct. For the leader to do so would be to fail in his stewardship as well as to create significant liability risks for himself and his institutional employer.

There remains, of course, a question of what quantum of knowledge is sufficient to trigger liability under the standard that we propose. If a religious leader becomes aware of a single, vague rumor about the predilections of a particular pastor, will the leader (and his employer) be chargeable with actual knowledge of danger if the pastor subsequently acts in sexually predatory ways toward his congregants?

The best analogy on this issue from the law of defamation relates to the question of what degree of disregard for the truth is “reckless.” Under the regime of New York Times, reckless disregard for the truth involves “serious doubts as to the truth of [the] publication.” Transposition of this norm into the law of negligent employment of clergy involves sensitivity to both the similarities and differences in the relevant legal contexts.

Unlike the problem of defamation, in which the judgment to be made involves an appraisal of the objective truth of some past or present circumstance, the context of negligent employment involves prediction of an employee’s future behavior. Predictive judgments are frequently more contingent and difficult than ascertainment of the truth of stories typically reported in the press. Nevertheless, the underlying emphasis from New York Times on the gravity of doubt is appropriate here. We suggest that supervising officials be held liable only when they fail to act on knowledge creating substantial grounds for concern that a member of the clergy will use his position to commit sexual crime or to take sexual advantage of a member of the faith. When coupled with the procedural protections that we suggest below, this proposed standard will oblige religious leaders to take action in appropriate circumstances without requiring them to purge the clergy ranks of everyone about whom there is even a whiff of uncertainty.

---

b. The relationship between culpable knowledge and authority over the offending employee. Adjacent to the issue of the quantum of knowledge necessary for liability lies the question of who possesses it, and whether the person alleged to have the requisite knowledge of risk also has the responsibility and authority to act on that knowledge. Imagine, for example, that a manager at the Buick Division of General Motors lives next door to an employee of a Chevrolet dealer, a firm which is in a contractual relationship with GM. The Buick employee knows that his neighbor has a tendency to drink at lunch and then drive autos around the Chevy dealer’s parking lot. If the Chevy employee’s drinking and driving leads to an accident on the Chevy dealer’s premises, the law would not impute knowledge of, and legal responsibility for, the accident to General Motors. The common affiliation of Buick and Chevrolet with General Motors would not make GM legally culpable on these facts, because the business relationship among the various parties would not support the imputation of knowledge from the Buick manager to the Buick Division, and then from Buick to GM, nor would it support the legal responsibility of GM for the accident on the lot of an independent contractor.298

In some circumstances, such questions of the coincidence (or lack thereof) of knowledge and authority may raise constitutional questions. In the context of defamation, for example, the First Amendment may require limits on whose knowledge may be attributed to the defendant organization. The press acts through agents and employees, and ordinarily a suit for libel would focus on what the reporters, editors, fact checkers and others involved in the subject matter of a story knew at the time of publication. Suppose, however, that someone working in the printing plant across town from the editorial offices, or someone working in a position equally remote from the article’s creators, had knowledge of a story’s falsehood.

298. RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS §§ 315, 317 (1965) (noting that a master has no duty to control the conduct of his servant outside of their employment relationship unless he knows or has reason to know that the servant’s conduct is harming others or creating an unreasonable risk of harm).
Would it violate the First Amendment to impute such a person’s knowledge to her defendant-employer? We know of no judicial decision involving facts of this character, but the constitutional argument is not hard to develop. If the defendant’s “state of mind” includes the states of mind of all of the defendant’s agents, including those who have nothing whatsoever to do with the story, the organization would have a liability-driven incentive to take expensive and time-consuming steps to clear every story it published with everyone who works for it.

Moreover, the problem of imputed knowledge, potential liability, and self-censorship would be that much greater if it extended to the defendant’s organizational affiliates. Assume that USA Today, a Gannett publication, was under a civil obligation to clear potentially defamatory stories with every employee of every newspaper in the Gannett chain in order to be sure that no one in the organization had actual knowledge of the story’s falsehood, or information that would suggest that publication is in “reckless disregard” of the truth. Once the imputation of knowledge spreads that far, no editor could ever be sure that his news organization was safe from a successful libel suit in a matter where the facts are contested and uncertain. The probable chilling effect of such a rule on major news organizations is obvious. Under such a regime of tort liability, they would be inclined to refrain from publishing anything that was potentially defamatory, or reorganize their processes in complex and expensive ways in order to avoid the possibility of such liability.

However farfetched such worries may be when applied to questions of libel, where the risk of the knowledgeable but otherwise uninvolved employee may appear remote, these concerns are anything but fanciful in the context of religious organizations being called upon to answer for negligent supervision of clergy. Any claim of negligent supervision must include an assertion that the employer knew, or should have known, of the risk that the offending employee would cause harm. Even within a religious organization that organizes itself along simple lines, the question of imputation of knowledge from someone within the organization to the entity itself may be quite difficult. If, acting collectively, a Baptist congregation hires a particular pastor, and one person within the congregation knows of, but does not disclose, the new pastor’s prior sexual misbehavior with minors, has the congregation engaged in actionable negligent hiring? A conclusion in favor of liability would be sound only if the knowledge of one is imputed to all.

To make matters considerably more difficult, religious organizations frequently have idiosyncratic and complex organizational forms. Consider The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints ("Church of Jesus Christ"), in which all adult males in good standing are members of a lay, unpaid priesthood. May the knowledge that any one of them has of the sexual proclivities of another be imputed to their local congregation, to their bishop, to the stake president to whom the bishop reports, or to the Corporation of the Presiding Bishop in Salt Lake City? If liability may result from imputation of such far-flung knowledge, religious organizations will come under tremendous pressure of one or both of two kinds. They may impose elaborate, expensive, and rigid systems of surveillance and reporting on all of their clergy, to ensure that those in a position to remove potential or actual offenders really do know everything that courts or juries might impute to them. Alternatively, or cumulatively, they may adopt a tremendously thick initial screen on those who seek the status of clergy or priest. Either way, they will have responded to the risk of liability by changing the structure of their organization or their criteria for the priesthood. For reasons we have elaborated above, law-driven reforms in either of these directions are constitutionally objectionable.

c. Constitutionally permissible adjudication of claims against religious institutions. In order to avoid constitutional problems of this character, courts adjudicating claims of negligent hiring, supervision, or retention must follow a few simple but significant rules. First, the legal judgment about who is the employer of a particular member of the clergy must be made using criteria identical to those utilized in analogous secular settings. Just as GM should not be responsible for the actions of an employee of a Chevy dealer, even if the dangers were known to an agent of the Buick Division, a religious organization that is affiliated by name with

299. Mark Chopko has done the most comprehensive work on the relationship between the complexity of religious organization and issues of liability. In addition to his article in the Boston College Law Review, supra note 67, see Mark Chopko, Ascending Liability of Religious Entities for the Actions of Others, 17 AM. J. TRIAL ADVOC. 289 (1993).

300. Our knowledge of the organization of the Church of Jesus Christ derives primarily from Frederick Mark Gedicks, Church Discipline and the Regulation of Membership in the Mormon Church, 7 ECCLES. L.J. 31, 31–33 (2003).
many congregations, but does not control their hiring, supervision, and retention of clergy, should not be held liable for the behavior of a congregational employee.

Second, this result should not change even if an employee of the larger organization has actual knowledge of the relevant risk. Liability in these cases should turn on a conjunction of knowledge and supervisory authority. Just as we argued in the preceding section that authority without knowledge should not be sufficient to create liability, so we suggest here that knowledge of risk, without legal authority to act on it, is similarly insufficient.

The concern that knowledge, unaccompanied by legal authority to act, should not give rise to the imposition of tort liability involves more than a constitutionally-inspired insistence on evenhanded treatment of religious and secular entities. Beyond that constitutional worry lies a matter of policy and practice that moves many religious entities, as well as some secular organizations. Crisis intervention by institutional leaders should not be the predicate of liability for their organizations. As long reflected in tort law policies concerning good samaritans, and as reflected above in our discussion of institutional fiduciary duty, the imposition of liability on those who intervene voluntarily to minimize harm will tend to discourage ameliorative steps. A similar concern attends the imposition of negligence liability on those who seek knowledge about wrongdoing within their ambit of institutional concern. If acting in this way leads to actual knowledge that a clergyman presents a risk of sexual misconduct, but the acquirer of that knowledge invites personal or institutional liability once the knowledge is in his possession, he may be disinclined to seek the truth and to act correctively through the use of influence or persuasion rather than legal authority. Legal standards should not discourage this sort of effort.

Thus, for both constitutional and policy reasons, we strongly recommend that the adjudication of claims of negligent hiring, supervision, and retention of clergy employees be accompanied by constitutionally sensitive methods of deciding who within a religious organization had authority to act in the requisite ways. On this point, we have no substantive recommendation analogous to the “actual malice” rule on the question of requisite knowledge. Instead, we urge in the next two sections of this paper that constitutional
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

Awareness be manifested in concerns of process. In particular, courts may demonstrate the requisite sensitivity to the issue of authority to supervise in their decisions allocating power between judges and juries, in doctrines concerning evidentiary sources, and in jury instructions tailored to the relevant constitutional concerns.

(ii) Processes of adjudication and the First Amendment. As suggested above in our discussion of culpable knowledge, the regime of New York Times is not one of substance alone. From New York Times onward, the Supreme Court has been concerned about the problem of jury bias in application of First Amendment norms in defamation cases. The rule of “actual malice” will do little good in protecting press freedom if juries, acting to protect their neighbor’s reputation, can systematically disregard the rule and bring in verdicts against the press.

Accordingly, the Court has created in defamation cases a series of process rules designed to allocate power to judges, entrusted with constitutional values, and away from juries. In New York Times itself, the Court remanded the case for dismissal rather than a new trial because “the proof presented to show actual malice lacks the convincing clarity which the constitutional standard demands” and thus “would not constitutionally sustain the judgment” against the Times. In subsequent decisions, the Court has reinforced this requirement that proof of “actual malice” must rest on clear and convincing evidence; that trial judges should lean towards granting summary judgment to press defendants in cases where the evidence of actual malice that would go to the jury cannot reasonably be said to be clear and convincing; and that appellate courts should scrutinize the record in defamation cases to be sure that they properly went to the jury under these standards. Coincidentally with and in support of this structure of decision making, the Court in Hebert v. Lando approved a broad right of defamation plaintiffs 302. 376 U.S. at 285–86.

303. Id. at 286.
305. Id.
to engage in discovery designed to ferret out evidence of actual malice. If that is to be the controlling constitutional standard, the Court reasoned, plaintiffs must be free to inquire into editorial processes in order to demonstrate that the press defendants indeed knew that the information was false or that there was a high probability that it was false.308

These process rules, designed to permit plaintiffs to prove their cases while at the same time protecting the press against juries that may be insensitive to the concerns reflected in constitutional rules of privilege, might play a comparable role in lawsuits alleging the negligent employment of clergy who commit acts of sexual misconduct. If a rule of “actual employer knowledge” were to be adopted for such cases, the procedural apparatus of defamation cases, including full opportunity to discover relevant knowledge, requirements of evidentiary clarity, and corresponding practices for summary judgment and appellate review, might well be appropriate for this category of litigation.

Even beyond substantive issues involving organizational defendants’ degree of awareness of clergy proclivities, however, these sorts of judicial controls might be more widely deployed in such cases. As we note above, a crucial question in many of the negligence cases brought against religious entities is that of the authority of the entity to take action with respect to a member of the clergy, even if the entity’s agents have actual knowledge of the danger. The combination of the inability of juries to appreciate the nuances of ecclesiastical structure, combined with juries’ high expectations for the organization’s virtuous character, render jury trials treacherous indeed for organizational defendants.309 In particular, courts should not leave juries to draw their own unguided conclusions about the authority reposed in an officer with the title of “bishop,” or other comparable titles suggesting hierarchical authority.

In light of the danger that negligent employment claims pose to the freedom to structure ecclesiastical arrangements free from state prescription or interference, judges might assume extraordinary control of such cases. In particular, judges might take it upon

308. Id. at 175–77.
309. See Byrd v. Faber, 565 N.E.2d 584, 589–90 (Ohio 1991) (imposing standards for specificity of pleading in negligent employment cases because of danger of excessive entanglement with religious organization).
themselves to inspect the evidence of supervisory authority, in order to be sure that the evidence to support a finding of requisite authority is sufficiently clear and convincing that the question should appropriately go to the jury.

We recognize that this recommendation is one of process alone, and that substantive constitutional questions remain concerning the sources of such evidence, and the permissibility of considering them in determining issues of knowledge and control. Whatever the form of the evidence, the role of the judge in such cases should be to ensure that juries will impose liability only on the basis of actions that create unreasonable risks in light of the actual structure of the defendant religious organization, understood as much as humanly possible in secular terms. Juries should not be free to decide what constitutes a reasonable structure for a religious organization, or to decide whether a religious entity has reasonably applied its own, internal rules.

The First Amendment doctrine of ecclesiastical immunity is designed to remove precisely those questions from state cognizance. If judges do not understand the contours of such a forbidden inquiry, they will be unable to properly ensure that the state and its decision-making processes stay clear of it. The subtleties attached to these questions are considerable, and we hope that our attention to them will invite more nuanced consideration than they have received to date.

(b) Neutral principles and evidentiary sources. Faced with claims that a religious institution has failed to exercise due care in the selection or management of its clergy, courts frequently ask whether “neutral principles of law” can be applied to resolve the dispute. The concept of “neutral principles” refers to an analytic model accepted by the Supreme Court, in Jones v. Wolf, 310 as a way of resolving disputes over the ownership and control of religious institutions’ property. As we suggested above, courts that invoke the concept of “neutral principles” typically, and with little or no explanation, restate the concept as “the application of secular standards to secular conduct.” 311 Finding that the tort law concept of negligent employment is built upon secular standards, courts proceed to employ those standards to measure the performance of religious organizations.\textsuperscript{312} A close examination of the Supreme Court’s decision in \textit{Jones v. Wolf}, however, reveals an inquiry that is markedly different from the one undertaken by most courts in the context of clergy sex abuse.

---

311. See text at notes 245–46 and cases cited therein.

\textit{Jones v. Wolf} was the penultimate chapter in a long story of conflict within Presbyterian churches in Georgia.\textsuperscript{313} In the mid-1960s, several congregations that belonged to the Presbyterian Church USA (PCUSA) withdrew from that body and joined the Presbyterian Church in America (PCA).\textsuperscript{314} The PCUSA decided, through its adjudicative process, that ownership of the local congregations’ property should remain with the national body. When the PCUSA attempted to assert control over the local church properties, the congregations brought suit to establish their rights to ownership.

In one such case, \textit{Presbyterian Church v. Eastern Heights Presbyterian}, the Supreme Court of Georgia decided that the property should remain with local congregations.\textsuperscript{315} The Georgia court found that the national church held the local congregational property in an implied trust. Ordinarily, such a finding would require deference to the national body’s decisions about the property.\textsuperscript{316} In this case, however, the court determined that the national body had breached the implied trust through its “substantial abandonment of, or departure from, the original tenets of faith and practice. . . .”\textsuperscript{317} The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Constitution prohibits courts from determining whether a religious community has “substantially abandoned” its faith.\textsuperscript{318} Adjudication of disputes \textsuperscript{312.} See text at notes 237–40 and cases cited therein.

\textsuperscript{313.} In \textit{Jones v. Wolf}, the Supreme Court remanded the case to the Georgia courts to clarify whether their decision to award the property to the local congregation was based on a standard legal presumption of majority rule. 443 U.S. at 606–08. In the final chapter of this saga, the Georgia Supreme Court held that the trial court had properly applied the presumption of majority rule, and affirmed a decision in favor of the majority. Jones v. Wolf, 260 S.E.2d 84 (1979).
\textsuperscript{315.} 159 S.E.2d 690 (Ga. 1968), rev’d, Hull Church, 393 U.S. 440.
\textsuperscript{316.} \textit{Id.} at 695–96.
\textsuperscript{317.} \textit{Id.} at 701. The actual holding was slightly more complicated, but no more constitutionally appealing: the Georgia court held that the question of the national church’s departure from doctrine was one that properly went to the jury for determination. \textit{Id.}
\textsuperscript{318.} \textit{Hull Church}, 393 US at 450.

1874
within religious organizations, the Court held, must not turn on the resolution of ecclesiastical questions.\textsuperscript{319} Instead, “there are neutral principles of law, developed for use in all property disputes, which can be applied without ‘establishing’ churches to which property is awarded.”\textsuperscript{320}

On remand, the Supreme Court of Georgia abandoned its doctrine of implied trust and held that it now would adjudicate such disputes by examining the traditional documents used to resolve any dispute over title to property.\textsuperscript{321} The Georgia court then found that the deeds to the church properties in question made no mention of any express trust or other interest benefiting the national church and so reaffirmed ownership in the local congregations.\textsuperscript{322}

\textit{Jones v. Wolf} involved a very similar controversy within another Presbyterian congregation in Georgia. In this case, the congregation had divided into competing factions, and the majority group decided to remove the congregation from the PCUSA and join the PCA.\textsuperscript{323} The minority faction appealed to the PCUSA, which decided that ownership of the church property should remain with the minority faction.\textsuperscript{324} The parties brought the dispute before the civil courts, and, following the “neutral principles” approach adopted on remand in \textit{Presbyterian Church v. Eastern Heights Presbyterian}, the courts examined the relevant deeds, corporate charters, and other church documents and found no grant of an express trust to the national body. Accordingly, the Georgia courts confirmed ownership of the property in the majority faction of the congregation.\textsuperscript{325}

The U.S. Supreme Court affirmed the approach taken by the Georgia courts but remanded for clarification of the reason that the trial court had awarded the property to the majority faction.\textsuperscript{326} In approving the “neutral principles” analysis adopted by the Georgia courts, the Court wrote:

The primary advantages of the neutral-principles approach are that it is completely secular in operation, and yet flexible enough to

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{319} \textit{Id.} at 449–50.
\item \textsuperscript{320} \textit{Id.} at 449.
\item \textsuperscript{321} \textit{Presbyterian Church v. Eastern Heights Presbyterian}, 167 S.E.2d 658 (Ga. 1969).
\item \textsuperscript{322} \textit{Id.} at 659–60.
\item \textsuperscript{323} \textit{Jones v. Wolf}, 443 U.S. 595, 598 (1979).
\item \textsuperscript{324} \textit{Id.}
\item \textsuperscript{325} \textit{Id.} at 660.
\item \textsuperscript{326} \textit{Id.} at 607–08.
\end{itemize}
accommodate all forms of religious organization and polity. The method relies exclusively on objective, well-established concepts of trust and property law familiar to lawyers and judges. It thereby promises to free civil courts completely from entanglement in questions of religious doctrine, polity, and practice. Furthermore, the neutral-principles analysis shares the peculiar genius of private-law systems in general—flexibility in ordering private rights and obligations to reflect the intentions of the parties. Through appropriate reversionary clauses and trust provisions, religious societies can specify what is to happen to church property in the event of a particular contingency, or what religious body will determine the ownership in the event of schism or doctrinal controversy. In this manner, a religious organization can ensure that a dispute over the ownership of church property will be resolved in accord with the desires of the members.\(^{327}\)

Using neutral principles of property and trusts law, courts can examine documents relating to control of the property—including “religious documents, such as a church constitution”\(^{328}\)—to determine ownership. Any judicial inquiry into such documents requires “special care” to ensure that the court’s interpretation is performed “in purely secular terms.”\(^{329}\)

Many, including Justice Rehnquist, have questioned whether courts should apply the “neutral principles” approach outside the context of church property disputes.\(^{330}\) We earlier quoted Justice Rehnquist’s opinion in denial of a stay in a case involving a religious nursing home, in which he stated that the “Court never has suggested that those constraints [imposed on resolution of church property disputes] similarly apply outside the context of such intraorganization disputes.”\(^{331}\)

There are at least two reasons for questioning Justice Rehnquist’s conclusion. First, Justice Rehnquist opposed special protections for \(^{327}\) Id. at 603–04. Professor Greenawalt raises serious questions about the extent to which the neutral principles approach actually respects the intention of the members of religious communities. Greenawalt, supra note 61, at 1901–04.

---

\(^{328}\) Jones, 443 U.S. at 604.

\(^{329}\) Id.

\(^{331}\) Id. at 1372; see also supra note 241 and accompanying text.
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

religious institutions even in the context of internal disputes, so he would not be likely to extend such protections to external disputes. Second, the boundary between internal and external disputes is less clear than one might think. Disputes over the appointment or retention of a priest seem internal, but a cleric who alleges wrongful termination does not look much different from others who bring tort claims against the church. Indeed, disputes over the ownership of church property are not purely internal. In Jones v. Wolf, the majority faction literally excluded the minority faction from use of a church to which many of the minority had contributed.

Even if one recognizes that the First Amendment has some application to “external” disputes involving religious organizations, one still might believe that the special meaning of “neutral principles” associated with Jones v. Wolf should be restricted to disputes within religious communities over ownership of real property. As developed by the Georgia courts and approved by the U.S. Supreme Court, the neutral principles approach focuses heavily on the interpretation of written evidence, especially of legal documents like deeds and corporate charters, to determine the parties’ relative legal interests in the disputed property. This almost exclusive focus on documents is entirely appropriate in the context of real property; the Statute of Frauds requires parties to create or convey an interest in property in a signed writing. No such evidentiary limitation applies in most tort cases, in which resolution of the claim requires the court to consider all relevant evidence, including parties’ patterns of conduct that may directly contradict their authority as prescribed by church documents.

We may, however, glean from the neutral principles approach some guidelines for dealing with a wider range of disputes, including tort claims, involving religious organizations. The neutral principles approach has two central limitations on the scope of admissible evidence. First, to avoid the constitutional error of imputing to religious organizations patterns of authority that they have not chosen, courts might strictly limit the introduction of testimony intended to show patterns of conduct that contradict the organization’s written allocations of authority. Even if such testimony might be useful in determining what really happened in a given dispute, courts should be concerned that the jury will disregard the formal structure of a religious entity. Either out of prejudice against the organization or a desire to provide a remedy for the victim, a jury might impose its own views of the responsibilities that a religious organization should bear for misconduct by those who speak in its name.

Second, in looking to the religious organization’s documents to determine the respective rights and obligations of and within a religious organization, the court should examine only those materials that it can interpret in secular terms. If the burden of persuasion rests on the plaintiff, courts should look for clear statements of specific kinds of authority to supervise clergy.

In the context of claims that religious organizations failed to exercise due care in their employment practices, the reconsidered neutral principles doctrine would thus permit judges to make the most constitutionally sensitive determinations on a motion for summary judgment, rather than sending those determinations to the jury. By examining the documents that create or reflect a religious entity’s structures of authority, the court could determine whether a particular official or body had the power to hire, supervise, or retain a particular individual. As with the neutral principles approach in the context of property disputes, this examination has the decided virtue of letting the religious organization determine its own patterns of authority. The court would avoid the constitutional problem of imposing on the entity an alien polity.

This reconsidered application of neutral principles is less than perfect for at least three reasons. First, despite Jones v. Wolf, this application cuts directly against the basic intuition of many courts, which have intentionally excluded consideration of the religious community’s documents in the belief that any interpretation of the responsibilities reflected within such documents would unconstitutionally entangle the court in the religious community’s affairs. Second, the approach might work with institutions that have developed formal patterns of interaction, but many religious communities have unwritten and even fluid structures, which then cannot be assessed under this reconsidered doctrine. Exclusive reliance on documents rather than practices to prove authority thus can be no more than a presumption, designed to govern only when documentary evidence is available. Third, even in religious Communities that have a codified structure, a review of documents may not eliminate all of the ambiguities concerning the powers and duties of a particular office or body. In property cases, recourse to the default norm can resolve such ambiguity. In the absence of express evidence to the contrary, property belongs to the holder of record title. However, such recourse will not resolve ambiguity when the dispute involves the authority of a position. Nonetheless, we believe that this evidence-centered conception of the doctrine of neutral principles may be a useful approach for courts to apply in those cases in which formal documentation of rights and duties is available.
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

(3) Vicarious liability of a religious organization for its agent’s sexual misconduct. Plaintiffs in cases of sexual misconduct routinely claim that the wrongdoer’s religious organization should be vicariously liable for the wrongdoer’s acts. The claim of vicarious liability, typically referred to as respondeat superior, does not allege fault on the part of the religious organization, but only that the wrongdoer was an agent of the organization, and that the wrong involved acts that fall within the scope of that agency.

The doctrine of respondeat superior rests on a variety of grounds. Because the organization (the principal) reaps the benefit of its agent’s work, the principal should also bear the costs of that agent’s work, including harms imposed on third parties through the 334. See Chopko, supra note 67; Chopko, supra note 299; see also Carl H. Esbeck, Tort Claims Against Churches & Ecclesiastical Officers: The First Amendment Considerations, 89 W. Va. L. Rev. 1 (1986).

335. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 219 (1958). In at least two different ways, claims of vicarious liability can become intertwined with allegations of negligence. First, plaintiffs can claim that a defendant organization should be deemed to have ratified the wrongdoer’s conduct because it failed to take action to disavow or report the wrong, or to mitigate plaintiff’s harm. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 82 (1958); Gagne v. O’Donoghue, No. CIV94-1158, 1998 Mass. Super. LEXIS 4 (July 14, 1998). Second, a number of statutes relating to sexual exploitation by psychotherapists have provisions that hold the therapist’s employer liable for such exploitation if the employer has failed to investigate the wrongdoer’s employment history. See, e.g., Minn. Stat. § 148A.03(a) (2003), quoted in JM v. Minn. Dist. Council of the Seventh-day Adventists, 658 N.W.2d 589, 595 (Minn. Ct. App. 2003). But see Doe v. F.P., 667 N.W.2d 495 (Minn. 2003) (finding that communications between priest and female parishioner about intimate details of her life did not come within the definition of psychotherapy in Minnesota statute).
agent’s performance of his work. As a matter of policy, it also seems reasonable to impose that burden on the principal, because the principal typically has control over the agent’s execution of the work, the financial means to pay claims resulting from the agent’s misconduct, and the ability to obtain insurance that will cover such claims.

Plaintiffs rarely succeed in their claims that a religious organization is vicariously liable for its agent’s sexual misconduct. In most of the cases in which plaintiffs assert claims of vicarious liability, the court skips over the question of whether the wrongdoer was an agent of the defendant, because the court finds that the plaintiff cannot prove that the tortious behavior was within the scope of a cleric’s agency, regardless of who employed the cleric. Courts in a significant majority of jurisdictions have held that, as a matter of law, sexual misconduct is not within the scope of a religious leader’s employment by a religious organization. Such misconduct is, these courts hold, motivated by the wrongdoer’s desire for “personal gratification.” Although courts tend to reach this legal conclusion with little explanation, it is logically connected with plaintiffs’ claim that the sexual abuse represents a breach of the cleric’s fiduciary obligations. In alleging that the clergyman breached his duty of loyalty by taking personal advantage of the relationship, the plaintiff at least implicitly claims that the clergyman has put his own desires above his professional responsibilities and therefore has ceased to serve his principal. This, of course, is the legal description of acts that fall outside the scope of an actor’s agency.

337. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 219 cmt. a (1958).

338. See, e.g., Moses v. Diocese of Colo., 863 P.2d 310, 329–30 (Colo. 1993); Mills v. Deehr, No. 82799, 2004 Ohio App. LEXIS 2148 (May 11, 2004) (holding that a claim for vicarious liability was properly dismissed because sexual abuse “cannot be said to further the goals of religion”).

339. N.H. v. Presbyterian Church, 998 P.2d 592, 599 & n.30 (Okl. 1999) (holding that, as a matter of law, sexual misconduct is not within the scope of a pastor’s duties, and listing other jurisdictions in which courts have reached the same conclusion).

340. See Restatement (Second) of Agency § 228(2) (1958) (“Conduct of a servant is not within the scope of employment if it is different in kind from that authorized, far beyond the authorized time or space limits, or too little actuated by a purpose to serve the master.”). In other jurisdictions, courts have denied vicarious liability on facts that are intertwined with the limited situations in which parishioners may bring suit against the cleric for sexual Several courts, however, have allowed plaintiffs to proceed on claims of vicarious liability against religious organizations for the sexual misconduct of their agents. Most of these decisions follow Doe v. Samaritan Counseling Center, in which the Supreme Court of Alaska said that a plaintiff could assert a claim of vicarious liability against a counseling center that employed the pastoral counselor, whom she accused of sexual misconduct in a counseling relationship. The court held that the wrongdoer’s “motivation to serve” the employer is not a prerequisite to a finding of vicarious liability. “[W]here tortious conduct arises out of and is reasonably incidental to the employee’s legitimate work activities, the ‘motivation to serve’ test will have been satisfied.” In the counseling context, the court held that sexual misconduct arises when the counselor mishandles the “transference phenomenon,” which is a normal part of the counseling relationship. Seen in that light, the misconduct is a normal, if unfortunate, aspect of the employer’s business, and the costs of the harm are justly imposed on the employer.

misconduct. For example, in Hawkins v. Trinity Baptist Church, 30 S.W.3d 446 (Tex. App. 2000), a Texas appellate court permitted a plaintiff to bring a tort claim for sexual misconduct against a pastor from whom she received marital counseling only because the content of the counseling was secular. Id. at 451–52 (finding that plaintiff stated a cause of action under the Texas Sexual Exploitation by Mental Health Services Provider Act, TEX. CIV. PRAC. & REM. §§ 81.001–81.009 (2004)). The court then found that such secular counseling was outside the scope of the pastor’s employment; the church authorized only religious teaching and counseling and had no notice that the pastor was offering secular counseling. Id. at 454; see also Sanders v. Casa View Baptist Church, 134 F.3d 331 (5th Cir. 1998) (same); Hodges v. Kleinwood Church of Christ, No. CIV01-98-00384, 2000 Tex. App. LEXIS 4845 (July 20, 2000) (same).

343. Id. at 348–49; see also Mullen v. Horton, 700 A.2d 1377, 1381 (Conn. App. Ct. 1997) (permitting, in a case in which a plaintiff alleges sexual exploitation by priest-psychotherapist, vicarious liability claim to go forward because “a trier of fact could reasonably find that the sexual relations between [the priest] and the plaintiff directly grew out of, and were the immediate and proximate results of, the church sanctioned counseling sessions”); Nelligan v Norwich Roman Catholic Diocese, 2004 Conn. Super. LEXIS 476 (Mar. 5, 2004)
As long as courts neutrally apply the test for vicarious liability to both religious and nonreligious entities, the Samaritan Counseling court’s expansive interpretation of that test does not raise special constitutional problems when applied to religious organizations. If the underlying tort claim against the employee survives constitutional scrutiny, then the identity of the one upon whom the remedy is imposed—whether agent or principal—is a matter without constitutional significance.

Cases on clergy sexual misconduct do not typically address the issue of the wrongdoer’s status as an agent, but the one court that did squarely address that question found that proof of an agency relationship may proceed because the inquiry involves only neutral principles of law. In J.M. v. Minnesota District Council of the Assemblies of God, the Court of Appeals of Minnesota held that a plaintiff could establish a minister’s employment status through factors that courts apply to determine employment in any context: “(1) the right to control the means and manner of performance; (2) the mode of payment; (3) furnishing of materials and tools; (4) control of premises where work is performed; and (5) right of the employer to hire and discharge.”

The second, third, and fourth factors are clearly susceptible of proof by “neutral principles of law.” A court should be able to determine whether the defendant organization paid for the wrongdoer’s services, provided the means through which the wrongdoer performed his work, and controlled the place(s) where that work was performed. As we argue above, however, proof of the first and fifth factors—the power to hire, supervise, and retain—may well draw the court into complex and perhaps contested questions of (finding that, in light of evidence submitted that four percent of clergy had been accused of sexual abuse, such abuse is no longer outside the scope of duty as a matter of law).

347. Id. at 595; see also RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 220 (1958) (listing factors for determining when an actor is a servant).
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity ecclesiastical polity, questions that are not so readily solved through application of "neutral principles." Many religious traditions have multiple layers of authority, with very different types of relationships between the layers.

Even if judicial determination of which entity has the powers to hire, supervise, and retain is constitutionally problematic when the plaintiff claims that a religious institution has been negligent in its performance of those functions, the constitutional problem might be avoidable when the court is analyzing a claim of vicarious liability. Assume, for example, that a cleric has sexually molested a minor in his congregation, and the victim has sued the cleric’s congregation, diocese, and religious order under a claim of vicarious liability. Because a claim of vicarious liability does not require a finding that any particular defendant failed to use due care in supervision, such a claim avoids judicial parsing of the precise extent of authority possessed by any single entity.

Instead, the court can avoid that constitutionally sensitive determination by asking a simpler question—one that the IRS regularly applies: Was the wrongdoer an employee or an independent contractor? If the court deems the cleric to be an independent contractor, then the claim of vicarious liability fails by definition. If, on the other hand, the court deems the cleric to be an employee, then the court will need to identify the employer. In some, and perhaps most, circumstances, identification of the employer will be uncontroversial; a single entity will pay for and control the work of the wrongdoer.

In other circumstances, however, a number of bodies might exercise control over the employee, with corresponding uncertainty or dispute about the precise limits of each body’s authority. If a court finds sufficient justification to hold that several different entities bear indicia of employer status, the court might hold each of the bodies jointly and severally liable. The parties would then be free to allocate among themselves their shares of the vicarious

348. See supra notes 237–40 (discussing claims of negligent employment made against religious entities).

349. See id.

responsibility.351 Such an approach might even encourage the various entities to make ex ante agreements about how such liability should be apportioned for a given position.352

C. Criminal Culpability of Supervisors and Religious Institutions

As demonstrated in Part IV.B, religious institutions may be civilly liable for their failure to supervise their clergy, when such failure leads to foreseeable harms to those who are vulnerable. Does anything change when prosecutors pursue supervisors and religious organizations for alleged criminal wrongdoing arising out of the same conduct? We may glean the first insights into this question from the results of the criminal investigations of various Roman Catholic dioceses over the past several years. The most prominent and well-publicized among these occurred in Boston, where the Office of the Attorney General of Massachusetts conducted a lengthy investigation, empanelled a grand jury, and prepared a high-profile public report;353 in New Hampshire, where the state attorney general similarly investigated and reported on the Diocese of Manchester;354 in Suffolk County, New York, where the county district attorney empanelled a special grand jury that produced a public report, with names of alleged perpetrators and victims omitted, on sexual abuse of children in the Diocese of Rockville Centre, New York;355 and in Phoenix, Arizona, where the Maricopa County District Attorney in June 2003 reached an agreement with the bishop of the diocese in

351. This approach, of course, might also lead the various components of institutions to sever any relationships that might confer on them the status and responsibilities of an employer. To the extent that entities are willing to reorganize themselves in such ways—that is, by sharpening distinctions between the entity that employs a pastor and those that do not—that decision should be respected by the law. We are not convinced, however, that religious communities will so easily abandon the historical forms of ecclesiastical polity which have produced the present interrelationships between local and regional authorities.

352. In such cases, all that we have said above about constitutional sensitivity in processes of adjudication and sources of evidence applies with equal force. See supra notes 302–33 and accompanying text.

353. MASSACHUSETTS AG REPORT, supra note 2.

354. NEW HAMPSHIRE AG REPORT, supra note 11.

355. SUFFOLK COUNTY SUPREME COURT, GRAND JURY REPORT CPL § 190.85(1)(C), Jan. 17, 2003 [hereinafter SUFFOLK COUNTY REPORT]. Of the three reports, this one is the most detailed and graphic with respect to the sexual misconduct of the offending clergy.
lieu of prosecuting him for obstruction of justice. All four of these investigations focused on allegations that leaders in the church hierarchy engaged in supervisory wrongdoing, and all four contemplated the possibility of indicting leaders as well as the religious institution of the diocese or archdiocese itself.

In addition to their focus on organizations belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, these proceedings displayed certain common characteristics. First, they all involved sexual crimes against minors rather than adults. As noted above in Part IV.A, sexual abuse of minors by clergy is always a crime of some sort, while comparable mistreatment of adults by clergy rarely involves criminal wrongdoing.

Second, all of the investigations involved religious entities against which there had been allegations of systematic wrongdoing going back over a period of many years. The New Hampshire Attorney General’s Report, for example, summed up its relevant conclusions by asserting that “in multiple cases the Diocese knew that a particular priest was sexually assaulting minors, the Diocese took inadequate or no action to protect these children within the parish, and that the priest subsequently committed additional acts of sexual abuse against children that the priest had contact with through the church.” In Massachusetts, the Attorney General’s report found “that widespread sexual abuse of children was due to an institutional acceptance of abuse and a massive and pervasive failure of leadership.”

In light of this combination of criminal abuse of children and persistent institutional failure to take appropriate action with respect to accused priests, it should be no surprise that prosecutors pursued the possibility of supervisory or organizational culpability.

Third, none of these jurisdictions produced an indictment of a supervisor or an organization. As described below, however, all of

358. See supra notes 109–13 and accompanying text.
359. NEW HAMPSHIRE AG REPORT, supra note 11, at 1.
360. MASSACHUSETTS AG REPORT, supra note 2, at 3.
the investigations produced evidence of wrongdoing that public authorities thought sufficient to warrant the imposition of criminal penalties. In Boston, and Suffolk County, N.Y., the authorities concluded that the available law was insufficient, either because (in the cases of many of the sexual abusers) the statutes of limitations had expired\textsuperscript{361} or (in the cases of supervisors and organizations) the relevant criminal statutes were insufficiently tailored to the wrongs.\textsuperscript{362} In Manchester and Phoenix, church officers admitted wrongdoing, and the investigations ended with agreements rather than trials.\textsuperscript{363}

1. Manchester, New Hampshire

The State of New Hampshire came closest to an indictment of the diocese itself. The Attorney General’s Report, released in March 2003 asserts that the State “was prepared to present indictments [to the local grand jury] . . . charging the Diocese of Manchester with multiple counts of endangering the welfare of a minor . . . .”\textsuperscript{364} Rather than face those indictments, the diocese “acknowledged that the State had evidence likely to sustain a conviction against the diocese for child endangerment.”\textsuperscript{365} “The diocese entered into an agreement with the State in which the diocese promised to comply with strict requirements of reporting future allegations of similar wrongdoing, and to provide the state authorities with unlimited access to church documents, past and future, concerning the internal handling of such claims.”\textsuperscript{366}

\textsuperscript{361} SupeRFORD COUNTY REPORT, supra note 355, at 172.
\textsuperscript{362} See MASSACHUSETTS AG REPORT, supra note 2, at 21–22.
\textsuperscript{363} NEW HAMPSHIRE AG REPORT, supra note 11, at 1; Alan Cooperman, Bishop Avoids Charges, WASH. POST, June 3, 2003, at A1 (describing admission by Bishop of Phoenix that he “concealed sexual abuse of children by priests”).
\textsuperscript{364} NEW HAMPSHIRE AG REPORT, supra note 11, at 1. The relevant statute, New Hampshire Revised Statutes Annotated § 639:3, provides that “[a] person is guilty of endangering the welfare of a child . . . if he knowingly endangers the welfare of a child under 18 years of age . . . by purposely violating a duty of care, protection, or support he owes to such a child.” Under state law, a corporation (including the “corporation sole” represented in the office of the Roman Catholic Bishop of Manchester) is included within the definition of “person” in the state’s criminal code. N.H. REV. STAT. ANN. § 625:11, II (2004).
\textsuperscript{365} NEW HAMPSHIRE AG REPORT, supra note 11, at 1.
\textsuperscript{366} The key provisions of the agreement are summarized in the NEW HAMPSHIRE AG REPORT, supra note 11, at 2. New Hampshire is the only state (out of the four that have brought investigations against clergy) to explore First Amendment considerations, but these are limited to cursory analysis of Employment Division v. Smith and do not represent anything
2. Boston, Massachusetts

The Massachusetts Attorney General’s Report, released to the public in July 2003, conceded that its investigation had found no evidence of recent or ongoing sexual abuse of children in the Archdiocese of Boston.\footnote{M\textsc{assachusetts} AG R\textsc{eport}, \textit{supra} note 2, at 15 (Finding No. 1).} The bulk of the Report, however, consisted of a scathing set of accusations aimed at the behavior of the leaders of the archdiocese.\footnote{Id. at 25–72 (Finding No. 3).}

Nevertheless, the Report included as a major finding that “the investigation did not produce evidence sufficient to charge the Archdiocese or its Senior Managers with crimes under applicable state law.”\footnote{Id. at 21 (Finding No. 2).} The Report cursorily analyzes and dismisses the possibility that the Archdiocese or its leaders might have (1) committed acts of obstruction of justice; (2) been accessories before or after the fact of the felony of child sexual abuse; or (3) been parties to a criminal conspiracy. All of these crimes include requirements of intent to facilitate or benefit from the primary crime, and the Report asserts that the evidence from the investigation did not support a finding of such intent.

The Report applauded, however, the recent enactment by the Massachusetts legislature of several laws designed to correct similar wrongdoing in the future. First, in the spring of 2002, the legislature acted to extend to clergy and other church employees who work regularly with children on the church’s behalf the state’s law on mandatory reporting of child abuse.\footnote{Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 119, § 51A (2004). This law, which had originally been enacted in 1973 and had covered health care professionals, teachers, and others but not clergy, was amended to include any priest, rabbi, clergy member, ordained or licensed minister, leader of any church or religious body, accredited Christian Science practitioner, person performing official duties on behalf of a church or religious body that are recognized as the duties of a priest, rabbi, clergy, ordained or licensed minister, leader of any church or religious} Second, a few months later, the legislature created the new crime of “recklessly endangering children.” This enactment covers “[w]hoever wantonly or recklessly engages in conduct that creates a substantial risk of serious bodily injury or sexual abuse to a child or wantonly or recklessly fails to take reasonable steps to alleviate such risk where there is a duty to act.”

The Report laments that neither of these enactments apply to the Archdiocese’s institutional failures, all of which predated the new laws.

3. Suffolk County (Long Island), New York

The report of the special grand jury empanelled to investigate the Diocese of Rockville Centre is the most graphic of all those produced by the official inquiries into possible criminal wrongdoings by a Catholic Diocese or Archdiocese. The Report includes nearly a hundred pages of close detail concerning alleged instances of abuse of minors by diocesan priests and the failures of other diocesan agents, aware of the abuses, to take protective action.373 Additionally, the Report devotes another sixty-five pages to the institutional inadequacies of diocesan policy and practice in responding to sexual abuse by clergy.374

Nevertheless, as in the Boston investigation, the grand jury did not issue indictments. It concluded that the acts of many priests had

372. MASSACHUSETTS AG REPORT, supra note 2, at 24.
373. SUFFOLK COUNTY REPORT, supra note 355, at 3–95.
374. Id. at 106–71.

1888
violated laws protecting children against sexual abuse, but that the relevant statutes of limitations had expired, making successful prosecutions impossible. And it concluded “that the conduct of certain Diocesan officials would have warranted criminal prosecution but for the fact that the existing statutes are inadequate.”

The Suffolk County Report concluded with a lengthy list of legislative recommendations. These included elimination or extension of statutes of limitations for various sexual crimes against minors;376 the extension of laws prohibiting sexual relations between professional care-givers and clients to include “anyone representing themselves as a member of the clergy who provides health care or mental health care services;”377 the expansion of accessory liability to include postcrime conduct “that conceals or hinders discovery of the crime or the discovery of evidence of the crime;”378 the expansion of the statutory duty to report abuse of a child to include any child abused by any person,379 and the specific imposition of this duty upon members of the clergy or others serving a religious institution;380 and the enactment of a new criminal law on “Endangering the Welfare of a Child.”

4. Phoenix, Arizona

The Maricopa County District Attorney’s Office conducted a lengthy grand jury investigation of sexual misconduct in the Phoenix diocese. The grand jury indicted six priests for abuse of children, and the grand jury heard evidence that Bishop Thomas O’Brien knew of the misconduct, failed to report it to public authorities, and transferred the accused priests to new parishes without informing anyone at those parishes of the accusations.382 The district attorney

375. Id. at 174.
376. Id. at 175–76.
377. Id. at 177; see also supra note 34 and accompanying text (discussing tort liability for clergy who hold themselves out as providers of mental health and other services).
378. SUFFOLK COUNTY REPORT, supra note 355, at 177.
379. Id.
380. Id. at 178.
381. Id. at 177. Such an enactment would apparently be akin to the recently enacted Massachusetts law on reckless endangerment of a child. See MASS. GEN. LAWS ch. 265, § 13L (2004).
seriously considered indicting Bishop O’Brien for obstructing justice as a result of the bishop’s conduct during the investigation.\footnote{Joseph A. Reaves, \textit{Bishop O’Brien Admits Cover-up in Handling Sexual Abuse Cases}, \textit{ARIZ. REPUBLIC}, June 2, 2003, at A1.}

Facing the likelihood of prosecution, Bishop O’Brien entered into an agreement covering the relationship between the diocese and public authorities with respect to the handling of complaints of sexual misconduct against clergy under the diocese’s jurisdiction. Like the agreement in New Hampshire, the Phoenix agreement requires reporting to public authorities of all complaints of sexual misconduct by clergy within the diocese. The Phoenix agreement goes further, however, by committing the bishop to appoint a Moderator of the Curia, who is to serve as the bishop’s chief of staff, and a Youth Protection Advocate within the offices of the diocese.\footnote{The full agreement can be accessed via the Maricopa County Attorney’s Office Web site at \url{http://maricopacountyattorney.org/Press/PDF/catholic_church_rev.pdf}.}

The agreement specifies that the newly appointed moderator, rather than the bishop, will have ultimate responsibility “for dealing with issues that arise relating to the revision, enforcement and application of the [newly agreed to] sexual misconduct policy.”\footnote{Id.} The Youth Protection Advocate is responsible for implementation of the policy within the diocese. In addition, the agreement specifies that the advocate’s decision to report allegations of child sexual abuse to public authorities is “to be made by the Youth Protection Advocate independently and not subject to the consent of Thomas J. O’Brien, or any other Diocesan personnel.”\footnote{Id. Bishop O’Brien’s woes have mounted since the plea bargain. See Terry Greene Sterling & T.R. Reid, \textit{Bishop Convicted in Fatal Hit-and-Run}, \textit{WASH. POST}, Feb. 18, 2004, at A1 (reporting on the conviction of Bishop O’Brien for “leaving the scene of an accident in which the car he was driving struck and killed a man”).}

5. Overarching considerations

The policies reflected in the enactments and agreements produced in these four jurisdictions are of course highly significant for the protection of children from future wrongs and for the control of future misbehavior of this character by any and all institutions, religious or otherwise. Our particular focus in the remainder of this section, as in what has preceded it, is on the question whether religious institutions deserve distinctive treatment, separate and apart from that afforded to secular institutions. With respect to the child protection laws invoked or recommended by these reports, are there any which invite consideration of ecclesiastical immunities?
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

At the very outset of Part IV, we rejected any notion that such immunities might protect clergy who themselves engage in actionable sexual misconduct. Nothing in the constitutional principles we have been exploring suggests any limitation on the state’s authority to allege and prove unlawful sexual contact with a minor by a member of the clergy. With respect to supervisors and institutions, however, we think that the Establishment Clause may indeed suggest limitations on some of the actions and recommendations that have emerged from these criminal investigations.

First, the imposition upon clergy and religious institutions of a duty to report suspected instances of child abuse may raise questions related to the priest-penitent privilege. If, as is frequently the case, the information about abuse does not come to the official of the religious entity from a communication covered by the privilege, this concern of course does not arise. In some cases, however, a clergyman may learn of sexual misconduct by another clergyman only as a result of an otherwise privileged communication. In those circumstances, may the state impose a mandatory duty to report? Such an imposition would implicate, for some faiths at least, profound issues of religious freedom. In the Roman Catholic Church, for example, a priest is absolutely forbidden from breaking the seal of the confessional. And it may well be both cruel and 387. See supra notes 109–11 and accompanying text.

---

388. The recent Massachusetts statute which extends to clergy the duty to report child sexual abuse exempts information gained in a confession or similarly confidential communication. MASS. GEN. LAWS ch. 119 § 51A (2004). For a thorough appraisal of these issues, see Norman Abrams, Addressing the Tension Between the Clergy-Communicant Privilege and the Duty to Report Child Abuse in State Statutes, 44 B.C. L. REV. 1127 (2003).
389. For a recent decision rejecting an argument that the federal or state constitutions require an evidentiary privilege broader than that afforded under the state’s priest-penitent privilege, see Society of Jesus of New England v. Commonwealth, 808 N.E.2d 272 (Mass. 2004).
390. See generally Abrams, supra note 388.
391. Non-Catholics may indeed wonder why this obligation of clergy is more strenuous than the obligation to refrain from sexual misconduct itself, especially with respect to a child. But it is the business only of the religious community, not the state, to assign gravity and priority among the religious duties of members of the clergy.
futile to impose a duty to report on clergy who will go to prison rather than violate the sacraments of their faith.

Whatever the policy merits of imposing duties to report on otherwise privileged communications with clergy, we think it is useful to frame and answer the constitutional question that such an imposition would raise. If the priest-penitent privilege is a creature of common law or statute only, it would follow that a state may create an exception to the privilege for cases of sexual abuse of a child. And, indeed, the case for such an exception would be quite powerful if every other helping profession were similarly regulated. If all secular professionals are obliged to report suspected abuse of a child, why should clergy be let off the hook? The demise of constitutionally required exemptions from religion-neutral general laws, dictated by Employment Division v. Smith, suggests that clergy would have no basis for complaint under the Free Exercise Clause if they were among a wider group of professionals whose communication privileges were trimmed as a response to the problem of child abuse. Only if the law singled out clergy from among other professionals would Free Exercise objections to that deprivation seem meritorious.

There remains, however, a different constitutional perspective from which to analyze the question of a legislatively mandated exception to the priest-penitent privilege in cases of sexual abuse of a child. For reasons that derive from considerations of equal protection as well as free exercise of religion, the scope of the priest-penitent privilege is appropriately compared with the scope of attorney-client privilege. The law currently assures perpetrators of these (and other) crimes that they may safely confide in their lawyers concerning their misdeeds, and the Sixth Amendment’s right to counsel may require such assurances. To permit the continuation of the attorney-client privilege for sex offenders while denying a

394. See generally Eisgruber & Sager, supra note 52 (arguing for a constitutional paradigm shift from understanding religious liberty as a right of privilege to an understanding of religious liberty as—and only as—equal liberty of conscience and association).
396. Id. § 68 cmt. c (citing Bishop v. Rose, 701 F.2d 1150, 1157 (6th Cir. 1983), and C. WOLFRAM, MODERN LEGAL ETHICS § 6.2 (1986) for Sixth Amendment justification for attorney-client privilege).
Sexual Misconduct and Ecclesiastical Immunity

comparable priest-penitent privilege for those same offenders is to create a secular advantage, favoring those who seek advice about legal consequences and options over those who seek spiritual advice concerning the same underlying behavior. Thus, so long as the state maintains the attorney-client privilege for sexual abusers of children, it may be under a constitutional obligation to do likewise with respect to the priest-penitent privilege. By the same reasoning, victims of or witnesses to crimes of sexual abuse should also have the same right to seek spiritual or legal counsel, without fear of professional betrayal.397

The second concern raised by the application of criminal laws to religious institutions in cases of sexual misconduct relates to the basis for imposition of affirmative duties to protect children and others.398 Included as an element of the crime of reckless endangerment of a child is a requirement that the perpetrator must be under a legal duty to protect the child.399 Those who are legal strangers to the child (even though they might be friends or neighbors) are under no such duty and, thus, need not act to protect a child, even one in obvious and immediate danger.

The crime of reckless endangerment thus sounds in fiduciary duty and raises the precise question that we considered in Part IV.B.1 concerning the constitutional danger that religious organizations will be held to unique and distinctive legal responsibilities. In discussing the duty of care that the Diocese of Manchester owed to its child parishioners, the New Hampshire Attorney General’s report cited with approval the decision in Martinelli v. Bridgeport Roman Catholic Diocesan Corp.400 We

397. This equality-based argument to preserve the priest-penitent privilege has the same force with respect to victims or witnesses only so long as the state recognizes the attorney-client privilege for those in the same position. For victims and witnesses, however, the Sixth Amendment right to counsel provides no floor under the attorney-client privilege, so states remain free to mandate reporting by lawyers and clergy when they learn of child abuse from persons other than the perpetrator. No states have mandated such reporting by lawyers, however, so the equality-based argument for exempting all communications protected by the priest-penitent privilege from mandatory reporting remains quite strong.

399. The prospect of being charged with such a crime led the Diocese of Manchester, New Hampshire to acknowledge culpability and enter into an agreement with the state Attorney General. See NEW HAMPSHIRE AG REPORT, supra note 11, at 1.

400. 196 F.3d 409, 429–30 (2d Cir. 1999), cited in NEW HAMPSHIRE AG REPORT, supra note 11, at 5–6.
criticize Martinelli in Part IV.B.1, above, for its unreflective acceptance of the risk that a civil jury might rely on the religious character of an organization in the imposition of fiduciary duties, and this criticism is similarly relevant to criminal prosecution.

In the criminal context as well as in the civil, we think it is a constitutional mistake to derive such a duty and all of its legal consequences solely from the religious character of the association. Religions may differ widely in their internal sense of obligation of the community to its members, and courts should not impose a single, compulsory model of duty upon them all without more careful, individuated inquiry. The proper question to ask in this situation must be a religiously neutral one: Has the organization held itself out as being responsible for the care and protection of children who are involved in its activities?

When the organization does so, duties of care to children follow. If, for example, a religious entity operates a youth ministry, children’s camp, or after-school sports program, the entity can fairly be said to assume a duty of care and protection towards the children enrolled. In these circumstances, parents and guardians trust their wards to the entity and its designated agents. If the entity assigns a known child abuser to a position of trust and responsibility toward children, it is fair to conclude that the entity has recklessly endangered a child toward whom it has a legal duty of protection. This result would be no different if the entity were a secular private school, camp, scouting program, or soccer league.

In contrast, the law should not hold a religious community to the same legal duty to protect all children within the community from all persons who have some authority to speak for the group. Suppose a clergyman offers, disconnected from his official role within the faith community, to baby-sit for a parishioner’s child and then abuses that child. It is not reasonable, constitutionally or otherwise, to assign criminal liability for that abuse to the religious organization, even if its leaders knew of the clergyman’s proclivities. To hold otherwise is effectively to put the faith community under a mandatory duty to defrock the clergyman for his prior abuse, a duty which the state may not impose.

401. See supra notes 200–12 and accompanying text; see also Chopko, supra note 67, at 1123–24.
Moreover, it would always seem unreasonable to impose such a duty in a comparable secular setting. If, for example, a university professor had been forcibly moved to emeritus status as a result of his sexually aggressive behavior with female students, we would not think that the university was under a legal duty to protect all women with whom the emeritus professor came into contact, even if the university had expressly permitted him the continued use of the emeritus title and he used the title to attract the attention of female students. The result should be no different if the organization from which the title is derived is religious rather than secular. As in the civil context, the Constitution precludes any concept of religiously distinctive liability or legal responsibility.

Our final concern relates to the remedial surrender of ecclesiastical authority under the threat of criminal prosecution. The Phoenix plea agreement raises serious constitutional questions because it represents just such a surrender. The agreement requires the Bishop of the Diocese to cede final control to the Moderator of the Curia and the Youth Protection Advocate with respect to the internal handling of complaints of sexual abuse against clergy members. Issues of allocation of disciplinary authority over clergy are matters of church structure, and the state should not be dictating or involving itself in such arrangements. Because such arrangements implicate constitutional limits on state competence, the state should be forbidden from entering into them, whether or not the religious entity is willing to make such a deal. However tempting such an agreement may be, litigants or potential defendants may not waive violations of the Establishment Clause. Remedial provisions, no less than substantive norms or procedural mechanisms, are subject to the constitutional prohibition on state interference in matters of internal church governance.

403. Several courts have recognized the constitutional significance of remedies in cases involving clergy or other leaders of religious organizations. See, e.g., Bollard v. Cal. Province of the Soc’y of Jesus, 196 F.3d 940, 949–50 (9th Cir. 1999) (contrasting constitutional implications of compulsory reinstatement of clergy, which is constitutionally forbidden, with an order of back pay, which is not); McKelvey v. Pierce, 800 A.2d 840, 852–54 (N.J. 2002) (same).
V. CONCLUSION

Religious institutions should have no sweeping immunities from any body of law, civil or criminal, dealing with any kind of misconduct. In most circumstances, courts should treat such institutions and their agents in the same manner as their secular counterparts. In some highly particularized legal contexts, however, the First Amendment may indeed limit the state’s decision-making bodies. The state may not impose unique legal responsibilities on religious bodies, expose such entities to an unreasonable risk of jury discrimination against them, or adjudicate the answers to questions that are internal to a religious community, including the crucial question of who may serve as a spokesperson for the faith.

These First Amendment limitations leave the state with ample room to act when its concern is the protection of those who are especially vulnerable to sexual exploitation. The state may impose upon religious organizations responsibilities that are comparable to those borne by analogous secular entities: (1) to take appropriate precautions in assigning leaders to roles involving the risk of such sexual exploitation; (2) to report wrongdoing, unless knowledge of it arises from a constitutionally protected relationship; and (3) to refrain from taking advantage of those who have reposed special trust and confidence in the organization’s leaders.

When the state does impose such responsibilities, however, it must rely exclusively on organizational characteristics that find analogies in the secular world. Just as some judges may be tempted to overimmunize religious institutions, others will be inclined to hold religious entities to unique duties of care and loyalty. The Constitution counsels resistance to such biases in either direction. That humans are forever overexpecting qualities of virtue in their religious leaders and institutions should lead us neither to confer upon them distinctive rights nor to impose upon them distinctive legal responsibilities. In this recognition of the thoroughly undistinctive fallibility of all human institutions lies a measure of wisdom, constitutional and otherwise.